SALIANS amongst others, men very skilfull in their Bowes, who so plied the ATHENIANS, that they brake them, and put them all to rout. Yet they did not flie amongst their Footmen, which made them somewhat recover their honour they had lost by running away, and all because they had not broken the Ranks of their allies. On the contrary part, as they fled they met with certain Troops of Souldiers of NEGROPONT, whom the ARCADIANS fent to take in certain hils hard by the Plain where the Battell was fought, and they put them all to the Sword. The men at arms of the Thebans seeing them turn their backs, did not pursue them at all, but gave charge upon a great Battalion of Footmen, forcing them all they could to break and run through them : fo the fight was very cruell and sharp, but in the end the ATHENIANS lest the place. This notwithftanding, the Colonell of the Horsemen of the ELIANS being appointed for the safety of the rereguard, defended them, and coming to the encounter of the BOBOTIANS he relifted them, and made them speedily give back : and this reformed the fault again of the left Point of their Army. But in the right Point, after the Horsemen had charged one upon another, the Fight was soon tried. For , by reason of the great number of the men at arms of the THEBANS and THESSALIANS. the partakers of the Mantineans were prefently put to rout, and after they had loft a great number of their men, they succoured themselves about the Battalion of their Footmen. And this was the fuccefs of the fight of the Horsemen. As touching the Battalion of the Footmen, after they came once to the Sword, it was a marvellous bloudy and most cruell Fight: for never before that time was there fo great number of GREEKS in Battell one against the other, nor so great Captains, nor of better fighting and more valiant men. The two Nations that at that time barethe Name to be the bravest Souldiers for Footmen of all the world, to wit, the THEBANS, and LACE-DEMONIANS, they were feein front in the Battell one directly against the other. So the first began to charge, neither sparing life nor limme. The first charge they gave was with their Pikes, which being broken by force of the great blows they gave to each other, then they sought with their Swords, and laying about them body to body, there was no kind of fashing and wounding, but they both gave and received: and neither part shrunk nor gave over, but stuck to it mansully. And so continuing this dangerous fight a long time, by reason of the valiantness of either side: the Victorian state of the continuing this dangerous fight a long time, by reason of the valiantness of either side: ry ftood doubtfull a great while, and could hardly be judged which fide were like to have the upper hand. For every one that fought had this resolution in his heart, not to fear death whatsoever hapned; but rather desiring to make proof of the valour of his person, worthily gave his life in prey, to win honour in exchange. By reason whereof, though the fight was most sharp and violent, the event of it remained a long space betwirt two Irons , not to be discerned of whether side the Victory should fall. Untill such time as Epaminondas feeing that there was no remedy, but that therefolution of this doubtfull fight depended upon his own Vertue and Valour : he refolved with himfelf to venture his life upon it. So he presently gathered about him all the best and choice men of his Army, and of them having made a company of resolute men, he ran with great sury into the greatest preass of all the Enemies, marching himself the foremost man before his Troop, with a Spear in his hand, with the which at the first blow he gave, he slew the Captain of the LACEDE-MONIANS, straightway the other began to affail their Enemies. But Epaminendas killed so many in the place with his own hands, and did fo terrifie the others, that at the last he opened the Battell of his Enemies, and laied on them fo luftily, that they not able any longer to defend themselves against the valorous force of himself and his followers, were enforced to give back and to leave the place to the BOEOTIANS: who were straight at their heels, beating and following them so eagerly that in a short space all the Field was covered with dead Bodies, lying on heaps one upon another. But in the end , the LACEDEMONIANS feeing they could by no means fave themselves because Epaminondas followed them so near (given over too much to his passionate courage) they gathered a Troop together, and running all on heaps they fet upon him, throwing infinite numbers of Darts at him, of the which he put by fome, and received others upon his Target: but yet there were many that fluck in his body , which he pulled out himself , and with the felf-same Weapons fought with them that had thrown them at him. At the last, when he had fought more then a man, and beyond all the force a man could use to give his Countrey the Victory: a LACONIAN called Anticrates thrust him into the breast with a Dart with such a deadly wound- force, that the Wood brake, and the Iron with the Tronchion remained in his Body. Having received this great wound, he fuddenly fell down to the ground: but then was there a more cruell fight about him then before, with great flaughter of both fides: until that the Thebans which had much stronger bodies then the LACEDEMONIANS, made them flie for life : and after they had followed them a little way, they returned again to the Camp where the Battell was fought, to the end they might have the dead bodies in their power, and so the whole Victory. Thereupon they founded the retrait, and thus the Battell ceased, for the which both of them set up tokens of Triumph, either fide pretending they had the better. For the ATHENIANS having overthrown those of NEGROPONT and their Adherents which were sent to take the hils of that Plain : they kept the bodies in their power. The THEBANS on the other fide having overcome the Spartans, had the bodies of those that were dead in that Battell in their power, being the far greater number also: wherefore they faid that they were Victours. So standing in these termes, it was a good while before they sent Trumpeter or Herauld the one to the other to bury their dead : untill that the LACEDEMONIANS sent first of all, and then they all took their dead bodies and buried them. And furthermore, he that had killed Epaminondas was fo well thought of , and highly efteemed for this valiant act of his , for the great fear all the SPARTANS had had of Epaminondas in time past; that they gave him many great Prelents and Honours, and belides, made those that came after him free from all publique charges and contributions in the Common-wealth. And Plutarch also faid, that in his time one Gallierates, a Nephew of Anticrates above named, did then enjoy that freedom. Touching Epaminosade, he was brought vet alive another into his Tent: howbeit the Phylitians and Surgeons being called together to dress him, they all agreed, that so foon as ever they pulled out the head and splent of the Dart out of his Body, he must needs die. So he made a most worthy and noble end of his life : for first he called for his Target-bearer, who was always at his hand in Battell, and asked him, Is my Target fafe? He brought it straight to shew it him. Then he asked who had the Victory? The BOEOTIANS, faid the Target-bearer. Then he commanded they should bring him Diophantin and Polidan: but being told they were both dead, he willed his Citizens to make Peace with their Enemies, for that now they had no more Captains of skill to lead them to the Wars. Adding further to that above spoken, It is now time I die, and so commanded them to pluck this spill of the Dart out of his Body. At that word all his friends about him fetched grievous fighes and cried out: and one of them weeping faid unto him : Alas Epaminondas , thou dieft now , and leavest no Children Epaminondas behind thee. No that I do not, faid he, but I leave two fair Daughters behind me, whereof his death. the one is the Victory of LEUCTRES , and the other that of MANTINEA. Immediatly they pulled out the spill of the Dart, and at that instance he gave up the ghost, without shewing any fign or token that he was troubled in his mind. And thus did he imbrace that bleffed death: that fortuning unto him which he often had in his mouth : that War is the bed of Honour, and The commenalso that it is a sweet death to die for his Countrey. Now may we well see, that he excelled all dation of Epathe Captains that ever were before him, did accompany, or follow him. For who foever would minondar. compare all their Vertues with the Deeds and Glory of Epaminondas , he shall fee that the Vertue of him was more noble and excellent, then any of theirs. For in them will appear at the first fight fome special thing more eminent then all the rest, which hash made their same great and glorious: but in this man onely were joyned together all the Vertues and good Paris that could be wished for in a grave, politick, and great Captain, to make him perfect and compleat in all things. For in the liberall science, in Experience, ripe Understanding, force of Eloquence, strength of Body, disposition of his Person, in height and greatness of Courage, in Temperance, Wiledom, Watching, Sweetness and Courtese : and moreover in Hardiness, Prowess, good Judgement , and fufficiency in Military Difcipline : I know not where there is to be found to compleat a man. For my Opinion, I compare Epaminondae to himself. Also in his time he wan to his Countrey by force of Arms, the Principality of GREECE; but after his death his Citizens loft it immediatly, and fell daily to decay : that at the last Alexander the Great utterly overcame them, made them that were alive Slaves, and destroyed their City to the very ground. To conclude, before, and after Epamisondas, There is was under foot, and yet commanded all others whiles he flood on his feet. And fo we muft conclude , that THEBES was utterly overthrown in the Battell of MANTINEA, and that Epaminondas at that time wan an immortall Glory. And as in his life-time he had carried himfelf modeftly, and always detefted coverousness: so after his decease the THEBANS brought him to his grave at the common charge of the Town, because they found no money in his house to defray the least Charges of his Funerall.

Philip : that wifedom booteth not at all; Which forming justice, hopes to clime on high. Let Princes , that behold thy Sudden fall , Love right and meekness, lest like thee they die.

Philips Pede-

Mynea, the Second of that Name, and seventeenth King of MACEDON, of the Race of Temenides or Caranider, descended from Hercules, and that reigned four hundred and ninety eight years, reckoning from Caranas unto Antipater, in whom began another Race : he had three Sons by his first Wife called Eurydice , born in ILLYRIA : to wit , Alexander Perdiccas, and Philip: Alexander having succeeded his Father, reigned but one year, during which time he made War with his base Brother Ptolomans Alorites. But to appeale the ftrife betwirt them, they fent for Pelopidas, who was at that time in THESSALIE. He took up all their quarrels, restored those that were banished unto their houses, and (because this Peace should be more surely kept) he took of them for hostages, Philip, and thirty other of the nobleft mens Sons in Macedon, and brought them all away with him to Thebes. Now during the time that Perdice ar reigned , which was the space of five years, Philip kept at Pammenes houle, with whom Epaminondas wasvery great: and hereof it came, that some thought Philip was a hearer of Lysis Epaminondas-School-master; and that they conferred together in Philosophy. Howbeit Epaminondas was then much older then he, and furely it can hardly be that they were Scholars together: except they will say that Epaminondas continuing all his life time to profit by the study of wisedom, made Philip destrous to hear him sometime, and to follow him also. And it may be well enough also that he had learned of Epaminondas to be so quick and suddain of execution in the Wars, as he was: which was but one of the least parts of Epaminondas Vertues. But as for his continency, justice, magnanimity, and elemency, which were the parts that in truth made him great: *Philip , neither by Nature , nor by Education , nor by Study, ever attained bind it: for all this, he wanted not great Gifts of body and mind, as 'fhall appear in the difcourfe of his Life: and as Theophrastus testifieth, he was greater then any other of the Kings of MACE-DON, not onely in prosperity of Fortune, but also in wisedom, bounty, and moderation of manners. So it came to pass that Alexander, notwithstanding the accord Pelopidas had made, was traiteroully killed by Prolomy firnamed Alorites, who usurped the Kingdome, and was slain himfelf by Perdiccas: who after he had been overcome in a great Battell by the SLAVONS, in the Alexander and telt by Peraccas: who are in the acceptance of the three Brethren, fealing away from the place Perdiccas which he was in hoftage, fled into MACEDON, and came to fucceed in the Kingdom, the which he Philips elder found in great trouble. For there were flain at the last Battell above four thousand MACEDONI- Brethen are found in great trouble. For tierre were faithful at the faith and with blows, that they thought of nothing flain, and ans, and those that escaped were so beaten and associated with blows, that they thought of nothing flain, and ans, and those that escaped were so beaten and associated blows, that they thought of nothing flain, and ans, and those that escaped were so beaten and associated with blows, that they thought of nothing flain, and ANS, and those that estraped were in brateful and admind which the Hungarians made inrodes into Macedon, and the Slavons muftered again to return thither. There was one Crown. Paufanias also that aspired to the Kingdom, by the support of the King of THRACIA. And the ATHENIA NS also, they would establish one called Argam , and to this end sent a great Fleet by Sea. and three thousand Footmen well armed by Land, led by Mantias. Philip taking heart to him in these rude beginnings, began to embolden the MACEDONIANS by wife perswasions : he re-established Philips first military Discipline, turnished his Souldiers very well, making them arm themselves, and gave order Exploits. they should be continually trained and exercised. It was he that amongst other things devised how to close his Footmen, and that framed the square Battell, which ever fince was called the MACEDONI-AN Phalange. He was very gracious in his words, and by his promites and Gitts he wan the hearts and good will of his Subjects. Now finding himself strong, although he was yet but young of years, he resolved to make head arms the MACEDONIANS, that he overthrew the SLAVONS, leaving feven thousand of them dead on the ground: and the reft elcaped by flying away. Shortly after they were agreed together, and reftored unto Philip all the places they held pertaining unto MACEDON. Now the

AMPHIPOLITANS had of long time born Philip evill will, and whilest he was occupied in other places, they did him many injuries: wherefore he determined to make a sharp War upon them. He having belieged them with a puissant Army, and having brought his Engines of

ed to win them. But Philip having won POTIDEA, drave out the Garrison of the ATHENI-ANS, and used them very honeftly: for he sent them home to their houses, their lives and goods number of Inhabitants, he changed the first Name of it, and called it by his own Name, PHILIPPI. Within that territory he had Mines of Gold, the which he opened and digged so diligently, that he drew out yearly new made, about the fum of fix hundred thousand Crowns. By this means ber of Picces of Gold called Philippus, wherewith he waged a great number of men, and bribed many private GREEKS: who afterwards fold him for ready Money the Towns of their Countrey, against all his Enemies, yet not by open force , but where there was need : being always of this mind, to buy time and men as much as he could possible. So perceiving that the ATHENIANS did their uttermost endeavour to win the City of AMPHIPOLIS again, and that by this means they fought to bring the Kingdom of MACEDON into the hands of Argam: he made them leave it, and thrust out their Garrisons. As for the PANNONIANS (others read PÆONIANS) or HUNGA-RIAMS, having fent Ambaffadours to them, he corrupted fome with Money, and wan others by fair promifes: infomuch that they were all contented to live in peace with him. And by the fame means he brake the hope of Paufanias, having by prefents gained the King of THRACIA that aided him. And for the regard of Mantias Captain of the ATHENIANS, he marched with his Army unto the City of METHONA: but he remained there, and fent Argens with the Souldiers strangers whom they had brought with them, unto the City of EGES. Argans approaching near the Town with his Troop, fent to feel the Inhabitants, if they would receive him, and be the first that should be cause of his entrie into the Possession of the Kingdom of MACEDON. But perceiving they cared not for him, he returned again. Philip that followed him hard at his heels gave him Battell, killed the most part of his men, and drave the rest unto a little Mountain, where he besieged Fhilip discomthem fo ftraightly, that they were forced to deliver him all the banished men of MACEDON amongst them : whereupon he let them go their lives and goods faved. This first Victory of Philip put the MACEDONIANS again in heart, and made them bold to enterprife any thing afterwards, Hercupon he made peace with the ATHENIANS, and understanding that the King of HUNGARIE was dead, he entred into their Countrey with a main Army, overcame them in Battell, and made them subject unto him. Of all his Enemies there were lest none but the SLAVONIANS, whom he went to affail with ten thouland Footmen, and fix hundred Horse. But fince they could not agree together, Bardilli their King trufting in the Victories he had gotten before time of the MACE-DONIANS, and in the valiantness of his SLAVONS, he came into the Field and presented Battell. The which having been fought a long time, Philip behaved himself so valiantly with his men of War hard to their Walls, he beat them with fuch fury, that he made a fufficient breach, and entred the Town by force: out of the which he drave those afterwards that were his Enemies, and very courteoully used and intreated the rest. This Town being seated in a very commodious place, upon the Frontiers of Thracia, and of the Countreys near adjoyning thereto, flood him after-won by 1 hills, wards in great stead for the furtherance and increase of his greatness. For by means of that he standeth him prefently had the City of PYDNE, and made league with the OLYNTHIANS, of great power in great flead, at that time: by reason whereof he and the ATHENIANS envying one the other, they both practis-

as we shall fee hereaster. In all this business, Alexander the Tyrant of Pheres in Thessalv, having been slain by his Wife Thebe, and by her Brethren called Lycophron, and Tisiphonas, at the first they were honoured as men that had delivered their Countrey of a cruell tyranny: but very shortly after, these two men changing their minds, by Money wan the Souldiers whom Alexander kept for the guard of his person, and put themselves in his place whom they had killed. putting many Citizens to death that withflood their enterprise : and having gathered together a great number of Souldiers, they made themselves Lords of Pheres. The ALEVADES, men of authority, and greatly followed in the Countrey for the ancient nobility of their house, would have opposed themselves against this new tyranny. But finding themselves to be too weak, they made means to Philip: who entring into Thessaly with his Army, overcame the two Tyrants, and fetting the Towns at liberty, which these Tyrants held in subjection, he shewed great love and favour to the THESSALIANS; By which occasion, in all his Conquests he had obtained afterwards, he found the THESSALIANS always ready to do him service, and to aid him in all his affairs. Philips great- and not himself alone, but also his Son Alexander. But the greatness of Philip grieved his neighnefs envied at. bours, infompth as the Kings of THRACIA, HUNGARIA, and SLAVONIA, not being ftrong enough of themselves, they joyned Forces together to make War upon him, and to be revenged. Whileft they were preparing to joyn their Forces, Philip went before, and compelled them to do

About this time, to wit, in the last year of the hundred and fifth Olympiade, fifteen years after the Battell of MANTINEA, the holy War began amongst the GREEKS, which continued ten years space : and this was the occasion. The THEBANS not being contented with the Victory they obtained at the Battell of LEUCTRES, framed a complaint against the LACEDEMONI-ANS in the Affembly of the Estates of GREECE: which they call the Councill of the Amphillions: and followed the matter fo hard, that the LACEDEMONIANS were condemned in a great fum of Money, because they had in time of Peace surprised the Castle of CADMEA. The PHOCIANS also, they having plowed up a great deal of a certain Land facred to the gods, called the Land of CIRRHE, were condemned by the Amphiliyons in a great fum of Money: and because they would not pay it, the Council pronounced, without longer delay and refusall, all their Towns and Lands to be confilered to the gods, and that all other that were condemned (of which number were the LACEDEMONIANS) should be compelled to pay their Fines, and if they refuled, they should be taken for excommunicate, and the other GREEKS should make war with them, as against accursed and execrable men. Philomelus, a man of great authority among the PHOCIANS, did so much, that he perswaded them not to pay it, but contrariwise to defend their Countrey with Arms, and to win DELPHOS. Whereunto they giving their consents, he gathered together a great Army, and in despite of all hinderance made himself Master of DELPHOS : cut afunder with flears the Decrees made by the Amphilitions engraven upon Marble Pillars; posses fed all the Gold and Silver that was in the Temple : and afterwards rendred a reason of his fact, and prepared himself to make War against the THEBANS, THESSALIANS, and LOCRIANS, and wan three great Battells of them. But being overcome at the fourth Battell, he threw himfelf down off a high Rock. In the mean space , Cerfobleptes, the Son of Cloth King of THRACIA, having rendred up to the ATHENIANS the Towns of CHERRONESUS, partly for the good will he bare the ATHENIANS, and partly for the hatred he had to Philip: the People of ATHENS fent Inhabitants thither to keep and defend the Towns. Philip perceiving that those of METHONS lent out their Town to all them that would make War against him, went and laid siege before it. They that were besieged, did valiantly defend it for a time : but in the end finding themselves too weak to make refistance, they yeelded upon condition, that the Inhabitants should go out every man with one onely Gown. As foon as ever Philip had the Town in his hands , he razed it even to the ground, and gave the Countrey all about unto the MACEDONIANS. At this fiege he was wounded with an Arrow, that put out one of his eyes. Afterwards he led his Army also at the instance of the THES SALIANS, into the Countrey against Lycophron, that began again to tyrannize over those of PHE-RES: who having demanded aid of the PHOCIANS, they fent thither Phayllus with feven thousand fighting men, whom Philip overcame, and drave them out of THESSALY. Then Onomarchus that fucceeded Philomelis in the charge of Generall, hoping to have won THESSALY, made great speed thither with all his Army under colour to bring aid unto Lycophron. Philip went against him with the THESSALIANS, but because Onomarchin had the greater number of men, he overthrew him, and killed many of the MACEDONIANS, infornuch that Philip himself was in great danger. For his men also were so afraid, that they would have forsaken him, and he had much trouble to keep them together : and in the end was constrained to retirehome into his Kingdom. Onomarchus departing from thence, entred into the Countrey of BOEOTIA, overcame the BOEOTIANS in Battell, and took the City of CORONEA. But Philip returned immediatly with a great force into THES-SALY to drive out Lycophron: who having called in the PHOCIANS, Onomarchus returned thinker, followed with twenty thousand Footmen, and five hundred Horse. Hereupon Philip perswaded the Commons of THESSALY, that they must all together undertake this War. And he could so well follicite them, that he affembled in one Camp twenty thousand Footmen, and three thousand Horse. Then was there fought a most cruell Battell, whereof the Victory sell to Philip, through the valiantnels of his THESS ALIAN men of arms. For Onomarchia and his men, they fled on foot towards the Sea, where was by chance Chares the ATHENIAN Captain failing all alongst the Coast with certain Gallies. There was a great flaughter of the Phocians there, followed by the Victors. Others to flie with more speed, threw down their Arms, and leapt into the Sea, by swimming to get to the Gallies of the ATHENIANS: There were slain in Battell and flight as well of naturall PHOCIANS, as of strangers that came for pay, above fix thousand men, and there were taken Priloners to the number of three thouland: Onomarchus that was one of them, was hang. Onomarchus ed, and all the other drowned as Sacrilegers, by the commandment of Philip: unto whom Lyco- hanged, abron veelded the Town of PHERES, and fo retired out of THESSALY, which by this means was fet at liberty.

As for Philip, he marched with his Army towards the way of THERMOPHYLES, to make war with the PHOCIANS, within PHOCIDE it felf : but the ATHENIANS Ropped his paffage. Wherefore he was constrained to return back into MACEDON, where he staid not long at rest, but determined to bring the Towns of CHALCIDE in subjection to him. So he took by affault a Fort called Gyre, the which he razed. But this was fuch a terrour to the other small Towns, that they put themselves under his obedience. Passing from thence into THESSALY, he drave away Pytholaus that had made himself Master of PHERES. And intending to bring the Towns of HELLESPONT under his subjection, he took in without pain or danger (rather by treason) the Towns of MICYBERNE, and of TORONE. Afterwards he went with a great Army against the City of OLYNTHE, the greatest and of most power that was in that marches : where first he overcame the OLYNTHIANS in two great fights, so that he made them leave the Field, and shut them in within their own Town, unto the which he gave many affaults, and loft a great number of his men there. But having with great fums of Money corrupted Enthicrates and Lafthenes Governours of No Town to the Town, at the length he had it by treason: and having sacked it, he fold the Towns-men for through the Slaves by the drum. The taking of this Town brought him a great quantity of Silver to help to may be overdefray the charges of his War, and did also make the other Towns afraid, which had taken Arms to come by relift him. Now after he had bestowed many rich Presents upon his Captains and Souldiers that had Treason. done him good service in this War, he gave also all about great sums of Money to the Heads of the Towns, and found Merchants also among them that fold him their own Countrey and fellow Citizens: infomuch that he himself confessed he had enlarged his Kingdome more through Gold and Silver then he did by force of Arms: according to an answer that was made him, when he began first to put himself forward : for being desirous to know how he should carry himself , the Oracle answered:

With Silver Spears begin and end thy War, So falt thou topfic turny turn all things, what ere they are.

Now the ATHENIANS being jealous of his greatness, did ever help them whom he would The policy of hurt, and fent Ambassadours to all the Cities, to perswade them to maintain and preserve their the Athenians. liberty, and to put their Towns-men to death whom they found willing to betray the Common-wealth: promising them to aid them all, and declared themselves open Enemies unto Philip. He that set The force of them most against him, was Demosthenes, the most Eloquent man of all GREECE at that time, and Eloquence. that did more trouble and hurt Philip with the blowes of his Tongue, and his continual motions, then all the Captains of GREECE did him besides. All this notwithstanding, with all the diligence and labour ATHENS could use, they could never bridle the wicked disposition of some private persons, but they still sought to sell their Countrey: for he that bought, sowed Silver without any spare, and there were a great number of Traitours at that time through all GREECE. And touching this purpose, they say, that he being desirous to win a very strong hold, he sent some men before to view it : who returning, reported that it was unpossible almost to approach it, and did by description fet it down in all points impregnable. Then he asked them if the place were fo hard to come to, that a poor Afs loaden with Gold could not come near it : for he had oftentimes with Silver very easily won that, which otherwise was not to be had by force of Armes. And this was the cause that he practifed to have Traitours in every Town by Gifts and Penfions, calling them that received him, his hostes and friends, corrupting mens manners besides by unworthy and dishonest means. As after that he had won OLYNTHE, he made sumptuous and magnificent Sacrifices to his gods, to thank them for the Victory they had given him : and fo having fet down a day of Triumph for tilting and tourneying, and common sports, thither repaired a great number of strangers that came to fee the Feast. So keeping open Court, he invited many of these strangers to come to his sumptuous Feafts he made, and in them he shewed all the familiarity and courtesse that might be to entertain them. For he drank to some, and then gave them the Cups wherein he drank to them : to othershe gave great Presents, and unto all generally he gave good words and large promises: insomuch that many fought how to obtain his love and favour. So it is reported, that one day at a Banquet he espied Sasyrus, an excellent Comedian and Player, that he was very fad : and that he asked him why he did not crave something of him, that he might shew his liberality unto him. Satyrus answered him again, that he would be glad to obtain a fuit at his hands, but he durft not ask it him, being afraid he should be denied. Philip liked his answer well, and bade him ask boldly. Then he rold him, that a friend of his had two Daughters among other Prisoners, both of them marriageable, and befought him that he would bestow them upon him ; not for any other pleasure or profit he should have of them, but because he would marry them both at his own charge, before they should be forced to their dishonour. Pkilip thanked him for his honest Petition, and presently caused these two Maids to be delivered unto him. Thus he bestowed many such courtesies every where, whereof he made his profit afterwards with great usury. For a number being drawn by the fent and odour of fo many good turns, fludied with themselves, envying one another, which of them might do him best fervice, and find out most means to deliver Towns and Countries unto

But now to return again to that we had begun to speak of the holy War. The PHOCIANS that had three very strong holds in BOEOTIA, to wit, ORCHOMENE, CORONE, and Con-SIES, did ordinarily from thence make incursions into the Countrey of the BOEOTIANS, with a great number of Souldiers strangers whom they kept in pay, and did burn and lay wasteall the Territory thereabouts, and ever had the upperhand in all their inrodes and skirmishes they had with the Countreymen. Upon this occasion the Borotians being weak of men, and wanting Money, fent in the end to demand aid of Philip: who was not a little glad to fee them brought fo low, for he desired their pride might be pulled down, which had lift there up so high since the Battell of Leuctres. So he fent them a good number of Souldiers, not for any defire he had to aid them, but to make them think that he made great account of the Temple of Delphos, which the PHOCIANS had spoiled. After divers exploits of War, the one side and the other seeing themselves weary and bare, the BOEOTIANS prayed Philip to come and aid them: which he granted them; and taking a supply of THESSALIANS with him, he came to Locride with a good Army, and put himself in order to end this War at one Battell. But Phalleeum Generall of the PHOCIANS, finding himself not strong enough to fight with him, fent unto him to Treat of Peace: fo he was fuffered to go fafely with his men whether he would. Whereupon under the assurance of this Peace, he retired with eight thousand men into Peloponnesus. The Phoci-Ans then left without all hope, yeelded themselves to Philips discretion. Thus having ended this holy War without stroke striken, beyond all mens opinions, he called a Council of the Boeo-TIANS and THESSALIANS in the which it was determined that there should be an Assembly of Parliament of the Amphitiyns, unto whom they would wholly refer themselves for deciding of this matter. Whereupon the Committioners for the Parliament of the Amphilityous were affembled, and there among other acts it was ordained, that from thenceforth it should be lawfull for Philip and all of his Race to fit in this Councill of the Amphiliyons, and that they should have thetwo voices which the PHOCIANS (by him larely conquered) had before. Also, that he and his thenceforth should have the Government and superintendency of the Sports PYTHIAN, with the Bos-OTIANS and THESSALIANS: because the CORINTHIANS had been partakers with the Sacriledge of the PHOCIANS. The reft of their Decrees concerned those of PHOCIDE, the salety of the Temple of Delphos, and the union of the Greeks. Philip having broken up the Armories of the PHOCIANS and of the strangers that had fought in their pay, he defaced their Towns, and made them fell their Horses. After he had received of the Amphiliyons the greatest honour Philip afpireth and thanks they could devise, he returned into his Realm of MACEDON, having won him the Name of a devour and valiant Prince, and laid the Foundation of the greatness unto the which his Son Alexander came afterwards. For he fingularly defired to be chosen Captain-Generall of all Greece, with full power and authority to make War with the King of Persia, ashedid. Furthermore, the hereditary quarrels he had against the SLAVONS, being as irreconciliable, he entred with his Army into SLAVONIA, where having spoiled a great part of that Countrey, and taken many Towns, he returned back into MACEDON loaden with booty. After that he went into THESSALY, and drawe out the Tyrants there, which held the Towns in fubjection. By this means he wan the hearts of the THESSALIANS, whom indeed he had great care to use well, hoping that if the THESSALIANS remained his faithfull friends, he should easily gain the other GREEKS to desire his friendship; and so it happened: for the People, neighbours to Thessaly, did presently enter into league with him. Soon after that, he led his Army into THRACIA to repress [trfoblepter, who troubled all the Towns of HELLES FONT next adjoyning to his Realm. When he had beaten the THRACIANS in divers encounters, he compelled the vanquished to pay yearly unto the MACEDONIANS the tenth part of their revenues; and fortifying a few good Towns in the best parts of their Countrey, he bridled the boldness of these barbarous People : whereupon the Towns within those marches being delivered from Wars, they very willingly entred into league and alliance Thus waxing greater every day then other, he held his Army before the City of PERINTH, because that stood against him, and took part with the ATHENIANS. So he laid siege unto it, and brought his Engines of Battery before it, among the which there were Rams of eighty foot long, and built up Towers of Wood higher then the highest Towers of Stone that were within the Town: upon the top whereof he marvelloufly annoyed the belieged : and battering the Walls with these Rams, he made them fall down in divers places. The PERINTHIANS on the other fide very luftly defended themselves, and reared up other Walls within, in place of them that were fallen down. He plyed them continually with wonderfull affaults, the Affailants and affailed shewing all their politible force and endeavour. Now Philip had great Crofs-bows and other Engines of all forts to kill far off, great Arrows long and tharp at the end, which did wound those that came to the cranewes of the Wals: and those that were belieged, lost many of their men every day. But at the length they were supplyed with arms and men, whom the BYZANTINES sent unto them: whereupon equalling their Enemies, they began to be couragious again, and refolutely offered themfelves unto any danger for defence of their Countrey. For all this, the Battery begundiscontinued not, and Philip dividing his men into divers Troops; gave them many affaults, continued by turns one in the neck of another night and day. Which he might eafily do, confidering he had thirty thousand fighting men in his Camp, with an ineftimable number of Miffile Weapons, with Engine to bestow great shot afar off, and of all forts of Engines to beat down Towns, with the which he wonderfully plagued and hurt the besieged. Nevertheless the siege drew on in length, and many of the Towns-men died, besides those that were hurt and wounded : and because that Victuals also waxed frant amongst them: so that they hourly looked for no other thing, but to take PERINTH. But it fell out clean contrary : for the fame of Philips greatness being blown abroad throughout Perinthrescued all ASIA, the King of PERSIA being afraid of fuch a Power, writ unto his Lieutenants upon the by the Perfiant. Sea Coasts, that they should aid the PERINTHIANS all they could possible. Thereupon his Satrapes having confulted of this matter together, fent unto the befieged a great supply of men of War, store of Gold and Silver, plenty of Corn, of Armes, and of all other necessary Provisions for the Wars. The BYZANTINES on the other fide fent them the best experienced Captains and Souldiers they had. By this means the two Forces of these Besiegers and the besieged being equall of new again, the War began to be hotter then before. For Philip beating at the Wals without cease with his Rams, made very great breaches, and with his Engines to shoot far off, kept them that none durft stay at the cranews of the Wals; and at one instant made his men to give an affault at the breaches of the Wals thrown down, and caufed others to scale the Wals that were yet standing whole, and so fighting with their Swords many were slain in the place, and others fore wounded, both valiantly fighting for the reward of honour and Victory. The MACEDONIANS hoped to have the fack of a rich and wealthy City, and more then that, to have goodly Prefents of the King. They that were belieged on the other fide, fetting before them all the calamities and miferies of the taking of a City, did luftily endure any pains and danger to prevent fo great a milchief. Besides that , the situation of the Town was a great help unto them, not onely to hope well, but also that in the end they should be Masters. For the Town of PERINTH stood all upon the Sea Side, upon a Haven of half an Island that stood of a great height, and this Haven was about half a quarter of a League long. The houses there were very narrow and high, and because they stood high upon the hanging of the Coast all the Town being underneath it on the ground, they were built much higher then those that flood beneath : so to fee them above, they shewed like the degrees of seats in a Theater. And although that they without did still beat down some part of the Wall: that vantaged them nothing for all that. For those within did nothing else but mure up the entrance into the Streets, which were narrow, and they always defended themselves, making Rampiers before the low houses, as if they had been the best Wals in So Philip having gotten the outward Wals of the Town, with all the troubles and dangers Philiphelied-

possible: he found other Wals ready built stronger then the other, as if they had been done eth the Byzanof purpole : befides that the BY ZANTINES did always furnish them with any thing they want- times for a ding ed. Philip confidering this, devided his Army into two, and let the half of them to continue them of Pefiege, under the charge of the best Captains he had: and taking with him the other half, he went to beliege BYZANCE it felf, and gave it a most brave affault : whereat the BYZANTINES were amazed, because their Souldiers, their Arms, and all other necessary Provisions for War were in the City of PERINTH. But the ATHENIANS fent them immediately an Army by Sea to aid them, as also thosedid of CHIO, of RHODES, and out of other places. Chares went thither, fent by the ATHENTANS, but he did nothing of worth, nor worthy of the Fleet he brought thither: because he was suspected of his friends, and defpised of his Enemies. So that they fent Photion thither, Photion a validation who before that time had fought bravely with Philip in the Ille of EUBOEA , (which he thought ant Leader, to have won by means of Traitours) had overcome the MACEDONIANS in Battell, and had done many other notable exploits. Howbeit after his departure Philip being the Aronger , departing from thence , came to beliege PERINTH , and after that BY ZAINCE , into the which Phocion entred with though to terrible in Arns that none could refift him, neither duff any man prefent himfelf both figes in Battell against him) role from the belieging of Perriver, and retired from By zance and with shame out of HELLES PONT, and did nothing, but loft much of his reputation. For befides the men and lofs that were killed at these two fieges, he lost some of his Ships, and many strong holds, out of the which his Garrisons were thrown , and his friends forraged by the ATHENIANS. This was the cause why he offered Articles of Peace, fearing the Forces of the ATHENIANS, defirous to forward his affairs some other way, or rather to meddle no more with them. Photion counfelled the ATHENIANS to hearken unto it, and accept the Conditions unto the which Philip Submitted himself: But the Counsellours (specially Demosthenes) that bare the sway at that time, moved the Atherita na wito a new league, the which Demofheres prepared against Philip: who bethinking himself, determined to employ all his means to subdue the Cities all at once, to the end that he might afterwards pass further. So he leavied an Army with great speed, and having Philip winneth overcome certain Troops of the Towns in league together near unto AMPHISE, he marched much into the Countrey of ELATIA, and afterwards wan PHOCIDE; and being lift up with fuch profperous beginnings, he refolved to go to ATHENS, Whereof the ATHENIANS having intelligence, they were straight in arms every where, the People being so amazed, that none durst be

Therefore keeping his Camp certain days, looking for the Forces of his friends that were not yet come unto him: he entred into BOEOTIA, with thirty thousand Footmen, and mat were not yet come also both Camps being ready to give charge upon each other, they about two thouland Horfe. So both Camps being ready to give charge upon each other, they about two mountain rivers. So would be a southing the number of men, and skil-both had like courage and refolution to do well. But as touching the number of men, and skilfulnels of Captains, Philip did pass them far: for having done in many places so many worthy exploits of Arms, he was become very expert in Military Discipline. To the contrary, on the ATHENIANS fide, their best Captains, as Iphicrates, Chabrias and Timosheus, were deal, the ATHENIANS fide, their best Captains, as Iphicrates, Chabrias and Timosheus, were deal. The ATHENIANS fide, their best Captains, as Iphicrates, Chabrias and Timosheus, were deal. Could that he should have no charge. Then was there but Chares and Lysicles, that were too weak to take such a great charge upon them , and were much insertiour to many of the Captains Philip had

Philip overthroweth the Athenians:

The day being broken, and both Armies fet in Battell the one against the other in the plain of CHERONEA: Philip placed his Son Alexander, coming but newly out of his infancy, in one of the points of his Army, attended upon by the best Captains he had and he placed himself in the other point, with the valiantest men in his Army, giving order and direction in all things according to time and place. The ATHENIANS, having taken one of the points of their Batell, less the other unto the BOEOTIANS. So the fight began very sharply, and many were slain on both fides, and it could not be differred yet whether fide had best occasion to hope of Victory: untill that Alexander at the length, defirous to make his Father fee fome proof of his valour, and many other valiant men feeing the courage of this young Prince, following him, they with him brake into the Battell of the Enemies, and there was a marvellous cruell flaughter. Philip on his fide also giving charge upon the greatest press and multitude of his Eneraies, not enduraing that any should take the honour from him, no not his own Son: set upon them so fiercely that withstood him, that he put them out of order, and made them flie for life. There died in this Battell above a thouland ATHENIANS, and there were taken Prisoners to the number of two thousand. And, of the BOEOTIANS in like manner there were many killed in the Field, and a great number taken. After this Battell, Philip caused a token of Triumph to be fet up, and inferred the Enemies to take away, the bodies of their dead, and to bury them. He made sumptious Sacrifices unto his gods, to give them thanks for his Victory: and honoured them that had done good service in this Battell, every one according to his degree and defert. Howbeit he committed certain infolencies: for after he had drunk well with his friends, he went to the place where the dead bodies lay, and there he fell a finging in mockery, the beginning of the Decree which Demofitions had propounded, whole counfill, they following, the ATHENIANS concluded to make War against him, lifting up his voice, and keeping measure with his foot : Demofthenee, the Son of Demofthenet PAANIAN fet out abis. But afterwards when he began a little to come to himself again out of his drupkenness, and that he had thought a little of the danger he had been in then his hair began to stand upright on his head, when he entred into the confideration of the force and vehemency of such an Oratour, that had brought him in a piece of a day, to put his whole Estate and his life to the hazard of a Basi tell. And when the ATHENIANS fent unto him to Treat of Peace, he prefently fer his countenance, rubbed his Eye-brows, and laying afide all madness and Wantonness, made them a very sober and advised answer. Others say, that he drank too much at the Feat of his say crince, and that after supper he danced and made a Mummery with his Minions; passed by the Prifoners, and gave them tharp taunts in mockery, touching the mistoriume of their overthrow: and that Demades then being one of the number was to bold frankly to fpeak a word to him, which was of such efficacy, as it made him refrain from his, infolency. O King, fad be, it being now thy fortune to play Agamemons parts, thou art not affiamed to finew the Deeds of Therfites. Philip finding himfelf southed to the with the word fo well fet, the presently changed his apparell and countenance, cast down to the ground his Garland of Flowers he wore on his head, caufed all the other figns of mockery which were carried after him to be broken, and from thenceforth began greatly to effect of Demades, and would have him a bout him. Demade: , being passing Eloquent above others of his time , did so well entertain Philip , that he caused him to deliver all the other prisoners of the ATHENIANS, without paying of any Ranforn. And further yet , humbling the Conquerours fierceness, he made Peace with the ATHENIANS, but put a Gardon within THERES, and morcover granted Peace unto the part and on a martian v

BOEOTIANS.

But that which principally brought him to incline unto it, was the defire he had to be chosen Captain-Generall of GREECE. And to this end he caused them to give out abroad, that he The cause would undertake to make War for the Greeks against the Persians, and to be revene, that moved ed of them for the outrages and facrileges which they had committed against the Temples of the Philip to make gods in GREECE: and fought to gain the good will and friendship of all the GREEKS. Peace with by all kind of courtefies he could possibly device or think of, as well openly as secretly. So Albenians, he made a motive, that he defired to speak with the Towns openly, and to communicate some things unto them, which concerned the good of all their Common-wealth in Generall. And for this purpose there was appointed a generall Assembly of the States in GREECE in the City of CORINTH, in the which he propounded this, to undertake the War against the Per-SIANS: and putting them in great hope of happy fuccess, he perswaded the Commissioners of every Town, which were prefent in this Affembly of Council, boldly to conclude this enterprise. He follicited his matter in fuch fort, that the GREEKS with generall confent chose him their Cap. Philip choseis tain-Generall with foveraign authority. Then he began to make great preparations for this War, Captain-Gieand having made a description and fess of all the Contributions, as also the number of men of War Greese, which every City should furnish for this Enterprise : he returned into MACEDON, and fent from thence two of his chief Captains before into Asia, Attalus and Parmenio with a part of his Army, commanding them to deliver the GREEKS Cities of ASIA out of bondage. But his death broke the Voyage, so that they went not very far. Now hitherto have we seen Philips naturall Disposition in the midst of his Deeds, and what is commendable and reproachfull in so great a Prince. But before we go further in the rest of his Life, it may peradventure not be much impertinent to infert in this place some of his Sentences and memorable Actions, whereby he may be the better discerned, to compare him afterwards with the others. For mens words and fashions amongst their familiars, be the very lively Tables of the Affections and passions of the Soul: it being unpossible for any man always to counterfeit so, but that they may oftentimes see his heart at his tongues end.

There was an ACHAIAN called Arcadian, that made profession to speak evill of him every where, his life do shew. And to this purpose he counselled his Son Alexander to speak graciously unto the MACEDONIANS, to win their good wils, whilest he had leasure now to be courteous unto them, another reigning in the Kingdom: as if he would have faid, that when he came to be King, he should carry the gravity of a Master and of a Lord, and that he should do justice. He gave him counfell allo to feek to get the love of those that bare credit and authority in good Towns, as well of the wicked as of the good, that he might afterwards use the good, and abuse the will. But now to return to his justice again : Being a Judge between two bad men, he ordained that the one should slie out of MACEDON, and the other should run after him. It is reported of him that he had gotten together a number of the wickedest and most disordered men that were in his time, whom he lodged all together in a Town which he had caused to be built, and called it PONEROPOLIS, the Town of Knaves. He had on a time bestowed the Office of a Judge upon one recommended unto him by Antipater : but understanding afterwards that he used to paint his hairs and beard, he took it from him, faying, that he that used deceit in his hiir, would hardly deal truly in a good Cause. Machet as pleaded a Cause on a time before him whilest he flept, fo that not conceiving nor understanding well the matter, he wrongfully condemned him. Whereupon Macheras began to cry out, that he did appeal. Philip being angred at that word, asked him prefently, unto whom he did appeal from him? Before thy fell, O King, answered he, when thou are awake, and wile give good ear to conceive of my Fact. These words touched Philip to the quick, whereupon he rose up on his seet, and calling himself better to mind, knew that he had wronged Macheras in his fentence, and yet nevertheless he would not revoke his Judgement : howbeit he himfelf with his own Money discharged the matter, whereupon the Suit was brought before him. Harpalus had a Kinfman and a Friend of his called Crates, attainted and convicted of great crimes; he belought Philip, that paying the Fine, fentence should not be pronounced against this Crates, that he might avoid the shame and disgrace. But Philip answered him again, It is better he should bear his own blame and discredit, then I for him. A Souldier of his, a valiant man of his hands, having by false report obtained of him the Gift and forfeiture of the goods of a MACEDONIAN: it fortuned that the MACEDONIAN ill willing to put up fuch an outrage, bewrayed unto Philip the unthankfulness of the Souldier whose life he had saved. Philip was so offended with the villanie of this Souldier, that after he had revoked his Gift, he made him quail in fuch fort, that his wickedness was known of every one, and the MACEDONIAN restored again to all his goods. A poor old Woman being in Suit of Law, befought him to give Judgement, and preffed him continually: but he excufed himfelf, and told her, he was not at leasure to hear it. The old Woman cried out aloud: Leave then to be King. He being aftonied and lively pricked with this word, did hear her, 'and all others in order. As for his friends, Philo a Gentleman of THERES had done him many pleasures at the time when he remained in hostage in the City of THEBES: he was lodged in his house, and after that he would never receive any Gifts or Presents of him. Whereupon Philip faid unto him: Take not from me the Title and Honour of Invincible, being overcome by thee of courtesse and liberality. Word being brought him of the death of Hipparchus, born in the life of EUBOEA, he was very forry: and as one that flood by, told him he was ripe and ready to die for age : Yea, faid he again, for himself, but not for me, to whom he is dead too foon: for he is dead before he received any recompence of me, worthy the friendship he bare me. As touching houshold matters, he fell out on a time with his Wife Olympias: and his Son Alexander: in which time of his anger, Demaratus a Gentleman of CORINTH went to vilk him. Philip then asked him, how, and after what manner the GREEKS lived one with another. Truly, answered Demaratus, thou careft much for the Peace and Union of PHILIP of MACEDON.

This word made him consider so well of it, that af- Hethatcannot much account of, are to reparate in the safe is the well in the beginning of Alexanders life; order well his and fo reconciled himself unto them. Being told him that his fon Alexander millide it, and com- will sill govern the salt him. Since thou feelt now that they will ill govern plained that he begot baftards of other women: he told him, Since thou feeft now, that thou a Kinedom shalt have many competitors with thee for the Kingdom after my death, endeavour thy self to be an honest man, that thou mayest come to the Crown not so much through me, being mine heir, as through thy felf, for that thouart worthy. He perswaded him much, diligently to study Philosophy under Aristotle, to the end, faid he, thou do not many things that I have done, whereof now heartily repent me. Being on a time fallen backward, lying all alongft the place where they exercife wreftling: and wallowing up and down, as if he had feen the figure and print of his body in the dust: O Hercules, said he, how little quantity of ground will serve us by nature, and yet we Nature concover to inhabit all the world! He would on a time lodge his Camp in a fair ground: but being tle. told that there was no forrage for the beafts, he was conftrained to dislodge from thence, faving: What is our life, fince we must take care even to place Asses? There was an host of his, that on a time bad him to supper with him. So, as he was going, he met divers by the way, whom he carried thither with him. Whereupon perceiving his hoft was much troubled, because he had not meat enough to feed fo many mouths: Philip feeing it, fent fecretly to tell every one in their ears whom he brought with him, that they should keep a place in their stomach for the Tart. The other beeth his frends lieving that he spake in earnest, did forbear to eat, whereby there was meat enough for them all, at a banquet, That which is already faid, is sufficient to make us know the natural disposition of this great Prince : whose end we are now about to describe unto you. He undertaking to pass into Asia, to make War with the PERSIANS, in the state of Captain-Generall of the GREEKS : being desirous his voyage should be favoured of the gods, he asked of the prophetels of DELPHOS, whether he should overcome the King of PERSIA? The answered him:

The Ox is crowned when his end is near at hand, To offer him in facrifice, a man doth ready stand.

This Oracle being doubtfull and obscure, Philip took it for his advantage: as if Apollo had told Philipdeseived him, that the King of Persia should be slain by him, as an oblation of facrifice. But clean con- by an ambigutrary, the Oracle threatned him with death in a day of a folemn feast: and that he should be skain as our Oracle, a bull, whom they crown with Garlands and Hats of flowers, when they go about to facrifice him. Notwithstanding supposing that the gods did favour his enterprise, he was very pleasant, perswading himself that Asia should shortly be tributary to MACEDON. So he prepared sumptuous and magnificent facrifices in honour of the gods, and made preparation for the marriage of his daughter Cleopatra. Now he being desirous to draw to this feast as many GREEKS as he could polible, to that end made Proclamation every where, that there should be Games of prize for Learning and Musick, and sent to summon all his hosts and friends, in what part of GREECE soever they were, to come to this marriage: and commanded the Lords of his Court that they should do the like for their part. For he defired to shew the GREEKS all figns of friendship, and to make them the best chear that could be possible, in recompence of the honour they had done him, to chuse him their Captain Generall. There was a wonderfull assembly of people from all parts at this feaft; and the marriage was folemnized betwirt Alexander King of Epirus and Cleo-Cleopara, Phipatra, and the Games also at ÆGES a City of MACEDON. Where not onely Philips private lips daughter friends, and the most notable men of the GREEKS; but also the principal and chiefest Towns of GREECE (and among other ATHENS) gave him presents of many rich Crowns of gold. The de-ties. cree of the people prefenting a Crown of Gold, and openly proclaimed by a Herald; the effect of it was : that if it happened any man having conspired or attempted ought against the person of King Philip, should fly to ATHENS in hope of priviledge there, that he should be delivered into the hands of the King. In the middest of this great Feast at the Marriage, there was an excellent Player of Tragedies, called Neoptolemus, that rehearled verses touching the enterprize of Philip: and as if he meant to have reproved the pride of the King of Persia, he lively touched that of his mafter Philip; and before he was aware, foretold his death in covert terms, and which might be applyed (as also Philip did , blinded and aftonied with his prosperity) unto the estate, and unto the King of Persia. Among other verses the beginning of it was very near to this effect:

Above the skies extoll thy pride. Surmount all haughtiness that is Within this earthly vale fo wide: Promise thy self a wordly blif , And prosperous life for ever sure, Yet canft thou now no longer dure. For some already have begun Thy ruine, which thou canst not shun: And death near to that breast of thine, Shall (hortly break off thy design.

The day after this royall marriage, the Games began to be played, and the people ran from all parts to the Theatre to fee them, even untill it was dark night. And in the morning at the break of day there was a procefilon, in the which (among many other fumptuous and magnificent thews) they carried the images of twelve principall gods of GREECE, wonderfull cunningly wrought with great art; and then after them was borne the image of Philip for the thirreenth, wrought with great art; and then after them was bothe the image of 1 map for the unfreenth, as if he would have placed himfelf in rank with his gods. When the Theatre was full fer with people, Philip himfelf came in the end, apparelled all in white, having commanded all his guard to follow him afar off: defirous to shew the GREEKS, that because of the great considence he had of their faithfull friendship, he thought he needed no guard for his body. But at that time he was put to death after a strange fort : and that we may know by what occasion, we will take the mat-There was in his Court a Macedo NIAN Gentleman, called Pausanias, born in the Countrey of ter further off.

ORESTIDES, one of the Gentlemen Pensioners of Philips Guard, that sometime was beloved for his beauty. He perceiving that the King loved another, whose name was as himself, Panfania: began to gall him with injurious words, calling him Androgyne (as much to fay, as womanish man) and reproved him that he abandoned his body to any that would. This fecond Paufanian very impatiently bare these words in his heart, yet made no reply to them, but onely imparted to his friend called Attalus what he meant to do ; and within few days after he loft his life after a notable manner. Philip fought a battle with the SLAVONS, in the which this young man behaved himself very valiantly, right beforethe person of Philip: and received upon his body all the blows they strake at h m, so that he died in the field. This valiantness of his being blown abroad through the Army, Attalus The Jecond I make the was in great favour with the King, intreated the first Paulanias to come and sup with him, and having made him drunk, he left his body to all the horse-keepers and mule-letters to be carnally abused. His drunkenness having left him, he was so grieved at his heart for the outrage Attalus had donehim, that he went and complained to the King himfelf. Philip was marvellously offended with-Private reall, because of the villany that was offered him. But because of the love he bare to Attalus, and also feeds a let to fee they he he flood in need of his families and feed to he had been to Attalus. species a let to for that he stood in need of his service, and for that he was Uncle to Cleopatra, the last and well beloved wife of Philip, and appointed his Lieutenant for the War of Asia, he made as though he knew it not. But to appeale Paufanias, he gave him great prefents, and placed him amongft the number of them of the Guard about his person. Pausanias having made his complaint to Olympias, unto Alexander, and to some other, had fundry answers, but no justice at that time. Wherefore keeping this Panfinias con-despite in his heart, he resolved not onely to be revenged of him which had done him this injury, but fpireth sgrinft also of Philip that would do him no justice. But to further him in this devillish purpose, amongst others a Rhetorician called Hermocrates did fet him on, whom Pausanias requented to learn of him. Discoursing one day together, he asked him how a man might in a short time make himself famous, to be spoken of by every body? Hermocrates answered, in killing one that had done many great things: for, faid he, it is of necessity, that remembring his facts, the name of him that killed him must also be compriled. Paufanias applying that to the purpose of his anger, having no patience to prolong time, his heart being to full of choler and grief, determined with himself to execute his enterprise the same day the plays should be: the which he did, as followeth. He layed horses ready at the gate of the Theatre, and went about it, having a fword under his Gown, after the fathion of the Gauls as they wear it. When the time was come that Philip would himself go to the Theatre, all the Noblemen and Gentlemen that attended upon him, went into the Theatre before him, who had commanded all the Philip traiter- Gentlemen of his Guard to come a good way behind him. Then Paufarias feeing Philip going all couly flain by alone, ranto him, and gave him fach a blow with his fword overthwart his flanks, that he ran him through and through, to that he fell down stark dead. The blow being given, he ran away straight unto his horse, and some of the Guard ran to Philip, others swiftly followed the mutherer, among which was Leonidas, Perdiccas, and Attalus. Howbeit Panjanias that had gotten the start before, had easily mounted on horseback before the others could come near him to overtake him, had it not been that in the way as he fled, he flumbled at the root of a vine, which overthrew him. Then Perdiccas and the reft lighted on him as he rose, and thrusting at him, killed him in the place. Behold how Philip that was the greateft King in his time of Europe, and for the greatness of his power, placed himfelf among the gods: was brought low, even to rank with the weakest of the world, and died being but fix and forty years old, having reigned twenty four years. That therefore whereof he gloried most, was in his skill of Wars, and in the actions which he managed bravely, preferring that far above all exploits of War. For (faid he) in victory all that fight in the battle have their part , but in those things that I have archieved unto, The wives and having wifely directed them, none is partaker of the honour but my felf onely. He had five wives, the first was Olympias the daughter of Neopolemus King of the Molossians, of the line of Acan, of whom were born Alexander firnamed the Great, and Cleopatra. Alexander fucceeded his father and for Cleopatra, file was married to her Uncle Alexander King of EPIRUS, and brother of Olympiat. The second wife of Philip was Andare, a Lady of SLAVONIA, of whom he had a daughter called Cyne, married unto Anymas his Coufin German: who being flain, the was betrothed unto Lagarus

King of the AGRIANIANS, who died before confummation of Marriage. After the death of Alexander the Great, the being of aymardy courage, and opposing her felt against those that would deprive the children of Alexander of the Crown of MACEDON, was flain by Perdiccas commandment. The third was Phila: and the fourth was called Mede, the daughter of the King of THRA-CIA. These two had neither of them any children. And lastly being too old to marry, he married Cleoparra, the daughter of Hippofiraths, and Attalus Necce; at the marriage of whom he would have killed his son Alexander, for throwing a cup at Attalus head: after the which followed great have killed his son Alexander, for throwing a cup at Attalus head: after the which rollowed great rouble and fould fit betwire Philip, Olympia and Alexander: but Demaratus the CORINTHIAN falved all that again. Of this last wife, he first had a daughter called Europe, and then a son called Caranus, whom Olympia put to a tright death. For his Concubines, the one called Affinors, being Philip. Congoner with child by Philip, the fell with Lagus hands, unto whom the gave Preslowy afterwards cubines. King of ECVPT: The tecond was clifted of Langus kings, called Philipsand of whom he begat Africans who first of all was possessed, and in the one cruelly murchered by Olympia: being the last King of the race of Temenides in MACEDON. For the iffue of Alexander, they were rejected by Antonder. The third was Nicalipolus, a woman of The SARY, and Jason lifter, Tyrant of Buffers: of whom he had a daughter called The flatonica, whom Coffinder married, and was afto the second of drank with their profperity.

place which they called Epipoles, as much as to fay, as over all the other Towns. It was governed a the first, by the command and power of Archias onely : but he being killed by Telephus, whomhe had abuled in his infancy, the SYRACUSIANS gathered together of divers parts, brought their efface to Aristocratia, which flourished for a time. But being come to pass that Tyndaris one of the Lords of the Town carried himself after such a manner, that he made many jealous that his drift and policy was to Petalisme, ban- make himself chief Lord; the other Lords made a Law called Petalisme, to meet with his practile: howbeit it was that that encreased his enterprize. The effect of this law was, that the name of him that aspired to make himself absolute Lord of the City, should be written in an Olive leaf, the which being put into the hand of this Lord, without further ceremony it was to tell him that he was banished the City for five years, much after the falhion that is reported of the Oftracisme of the ATHENIANS. By means of this Petalisme, the Lords banished one another, so that in the end, the People became Lord. But hereupon a dangerous fedition happening amongst them, Gela, Lord of the City of GELE, did to wifely look into the troubles of the SYRACUSIANS: that they chose him King in the second year of the threefcore and twelith Olympiad. After him succeeded Hieron, who at the beginning carried himfelf very evil: but afterwards falling into acquaintance with the Poets Simonides, Pind. rut and Bacchylides, which taught him many good things, he reigned very prudently. So, he having reigned about twelve years, left his brother Thrafybulus his fucceffor: who for his cruelties and infolencies was driven out of Syracus a by force, and went to Locres, and there ended the rest of his days. Then the Syracustans established the government of Lords, which continued fixty years: in which time they make War with the AGRIGENTINES, and compelled them to fue for peace:

they destroy the TRINACRIANS and their Town : they fet upon the LEONTINES, which are aided by the ATHENIANS under the conduct of Laches and Carceadas, who behaved themselves fo evill, that at their return home they were banished. Shortly after the new troubles betwirt the SYRACUSIANS and the LEONTINES, the ATHENIANS fent Phear into Sicilia to kindle the fire a little, and to mutiny the one against the other. Howbeit it had no good success: but rather raised a cruell War betwixt the SYRACUSIANS and ATHENIANS, in the which at the last Nicias and Demosthenes were overcome by lea and land both, and afterwards put to death. and the fouldiers of ATHENS that were prisoners most cruelly used. The SYRACUSIANS life up with this victory, did put down their Lordly Government, and brought it to a popular state again. Then thinking to be revenged of the CARTHAGINIANS that were come to the aid of the Secsimans against the Selinontines, which were their friends they sent Diocles with four thousand good men against Hannibal the son of Gifeo, who lay in Camp at that time before HIMERA, the which he wan after he had overcome Diocles, and slain the most part of his Troops. The Syracusians calting their anger for this loss upon Hermocrates one of their chief Citizens, they banished him with the Petalisme, and drave him out of the Town. He helping himself with the means he had in his hand, made up and armed five Gallies, and afterwards with certain banished men of HIMERA, attempted to put in again into Syracusa. But seeing he could not prevail, he landed and possessed the ruined Town of Selinonte, he repaired it, called home again all the inhabitants' dispersed through SICILIA, fortified himself there, and in few days got together a Troop of fix thousand men. With these forces he ser upon them of PALERME, and MOTYE, in league with the CARTHAGINIANS, OVERCAME them in a pitched field, maintained his friends, and followed his victory. The SYRACUSIANS hearing good report of Hermocrates valour, began to repent them that they had so dishonourably used him. He on the other fide being advertised by his friends of the good affection of the Citizens unto him : to win their good favour again, he was very carefull to gather together the bones of those that were killed by Himera under the leading of Diocles, and sent them to Syracusa, in Carts very richly fet out. For all this they fent not for him home, the Syracu-SIANS being afraid of him, for that he was a man of fuch courage and wildom, left he should make himself Lord of the Town. He seeing himself thus resused, went back to Selinonte. and shortly after being sollicited by his friends, he sound means by night to come into Syracusa, and possessed the Acradine. The Syracustans took Arms immediately, fought with Hermocrates, killed him in the Market-place with part of his train, and banished those that favoured him. His friends faved some of them from the violence of the Citizens, and amongst others Hermogrates, Dionyjim the son of Hermocrates, a plain Citizen of Syracusa, whose life we presently write the father of Dionyfim flair. Now it is reported, that his mother being with child of him, dreamed that the was brought to bed of a Satyre, and that the Soothfayers being asked their opinion, answered, she should have a fon that should be famous above all the GREEKS. Furthermore, a young Gentlewoman of Sy- Dreams shew-RACUSA called Himera, some time before Dionysius made himself Lord of the City, dreamed that ing Dionslius the was taken up to heaven, by a guide that having carried her to and fro, in the end brought her before his qualities, Jupiter, at whose feet she saw a young man with a yellow hair, bound with iron chains: and asking her guide what he was : It is, faid the other, the cruel fcourge of SICILIA and ITALY, the which shall spoil a great Countrey, as soon as his bolts be off his feet. Within few years after, Dionysus having already feifed upon the estate, as he came to make his entry into Syracus A, and that the Citizens went out to meet him to do him honour : Himera being there by chance, knew him, and straight cryed out: This was the young man that she saw in heaven. This being reported to Dionysius, he caused them to Hinters killed kill the young Damfel. Another time his horsefalling in the mire that he could not get out, Diony- by the Tyrant fin left him fast there: but the poor beast with strugling got himself out, and ran after his master; Dionystus, for bringing in his main a swarm of Bees. This did hearten him, especially through the counsel of his speaking trust, Soothfayers, to follow his purpose to subdue his Country: the which he obtained by this means. The CARTHAGINIANS defirous to make themselves great in SICILIA, sent thither their Captain Himileo with a great Army : against whom the SYRAGUSIANS made head, wan a battle and killed fix thousand of his men. Notwithstanding this, he went and besieged AGRIGENTE, and having upon furprise overthrown the Army of the SYRACUSIANS by sea, he enforced them that were belieged to fave themselves as they could, entred into this great rich City abandoned, and took the The occasion spoil of it. The AGRIGENTINES that escaped gave the Alarm, through all SICILIA, and re- of Dionyfustitiring themselves to Syracus a their friend Town, began in full assembly of the City to accuse singthe Captains of Syracusa, faying, that by their treason the Countrey was fold unto their enemies. Dionysius, the son of Hermocrates, a young man of a stout heart, and that did embrace great to furnish others if they were condemned : he followed his purpose in other assemblies, having attain the sospeech at will, and a comely manner withall, so that almost for little or nothing, he wan the hearts of veraignty. the people, who moved by his Oration, did cashier the old Captains, and chose new, and among others

matters in his mind, being in this affembly, took hold of the occasion offered; and seeing the people out of countenance, he stepped forth, charged the Captains very much, and gave counsell that they

Dionysius, who was a good souldier, and had made proof of his valianmess in divers encounters against the CARTHAGINIANS. But after they had chosen him Captain, he never came to counfell with his other companions, nor would not be acquainted with them: but under hand, made a foul report run abroad that they practifed with the Enemies. This made men of good judgement to prefume that he himself went about to make some alteration; and they could not forbear to blame him for it. Nevertheless the people not looking so inwardly into it, they effeemed him very much. Hereupon many affemblies were made to think of their affairs in Wars, in one of the which Dionyfiss perceiving the SYRACUSIANS aftonied, gave advice that they should call home their banished men: faying that it was a great mockery to run into Greece and ITALY for aid fince they had at their doors such as had been Citizens, who had rather die like vagabonds, then ferve the Enemy. And that the favour they should shew them, would spur them forward to do their Countrey good service. The wifest men durst not gain say this advice, perceiving that the people did incline unto it : that if they hindred that, it was to get as many enemies as there were banished : and that they being called home, should thank none but Dionysius, at whose commandment they would ever be afterwards. No man speaking a word, the decree of repeal was authorized by the people, and the banished men returned to Syracusa. In the midst of all this business, letters were brought from Gala, which demanded aid. Dionysium offered himtelf straight, and was sent thirder with two thousand footmen, and four hundred horse. Being arrived at GELE, and finding the City in trouble, he rook the peoples part, accused the principals, made them be put to death, and their goods forpeculies to a feited. With which forfeiture he payed the ordinary Garifon of GBLB, and promifed double pay to them that followed him from SYRACUSA: unto the which he returned immediately, having the favour of his fouldiers. So all the People ran about him in multitudes, asking him where the Enemies were, and what they did ? You do not confider, said he, that your Enemies indeed are in your Town, They that govern in your estate are more to be feared, then the CARTHAGINIANS: for whilest you are bulle about your plays and feafts, they divide the common treasure among themselves, and pay not the fouldiers. In the mean space Himileo prepareth himself to come and besiege you, whereof your Governours make no reckoning, neither do they give any order for it. I knew this well enough before, but now I am most affured of it : for Himileo sent a Trumpet unto me, under colour of certain prisoners, and secretly bad him tell me, that he would give me more then any other of my companions, fo that I would not fearth him too narrowly : and if fo be that I would not help him, at the leaft yet that I would not hinder him. And therefore think with your felves to find another Captain in my place : for it is no reason whilst others sell the Town to the Enemies, that I should go hazard my felf with my fellow Citizens, and in danger in the end that they should think of me I should be partaker with the wicked practifes of others. Those that heard what he spake, being marvelloully offended, carried these words immediately all about the Town. But for the present time every one went home to their house, sad, and troubled in their minds. The morrow after, as those that should speak before the people did draw by lot of letters, that they might know in order how they should speak, threwd Fool,

Dionyfius cho-General.

Hereupon the people chose Dionysia their Captain-General, giving him full authority, and power of the affairs of the Commonwealth, and praying him to consider of all that should be expedient to resist He feeing his enterprise to well grounded, propoundeth a decree to the people, that the fouldiers pay should be doubled over that it was before: for that would make them more couragious and willing to do good service. And as for money, that the SYRACUSIANS should take no thought for that, for he knew a way how to come by it well enough. This fo fudden advancement, and his bold promifes joyned with the disposition of this young man, made many suspect him that had any understanding and judgement: infomuch that some began to go and come to houses to conser together to find means betimes to withftand the tyranny, which had now (as they fay) put the irons in the fire. But Dionysiu having an eye abroad, and a number of Spies that filty fell into companies, being afraid they would do him some hurt, determined to provide for it by a far setch to fight, but very fit to ferve histurn: which was, to obtain licence to chuse a guard for his person, unto the which he came, as followeth. He proclaimed in the Town that those that were able to bear Arms should follow him, and to make their rendevouze with their Arms at a day set down at the Town of the LEONTINES, and bring victuals with them for one moneth. There was then in that Town a Garifon of the Syracus lans: the banished, and all forts of men withdrew themfelves, whom Disnyfin hoped would have taken his part, for that they were men which defired nothing more then change and alteration, and perswaded himself that sew of the Syracustans would follow him. Hereupon he went himself into the field, and being encamped near the Town, one caused his friends to give the Alarm, and to cry help, as if the Enemies had environed him to kill him in his Tent: and making as though he had been marvelloully afraid, he fled, and faved him-felf by fwitinefs within the Caftle of the Town, where he paffed all the reft of the right, made the People being affembled, and his turn being come to speak, he accused his other companions with great vehemency, was heard very attentively, and with great praise of all the people, whom the day before he had angred very much : fo that in the end there were some of the affembly cryed out, that neceflity required that Dionysiu should be chosen alone Captain General, with all authority and soveraign power, and that it was no tarrying till the Enemies be under our Walls, and that he was a fit man to take care of this bufiness: and as for traitors, that they should think of them at better leifure

fires all about, and fent for his fouldiers in whom he put most trust, as a man that is afraid, feeing his enemies lie in wait for him. The next morning some of the people of Syracusa being gathered together in the Town of the LEONTINES, in open affembly he made a long discourse of that that had passed, to make them believe that his evil willers would have surprized him, and could speak so well, that the people appointed him fix hundred fouldiers to guard his person, such as he himself would chuse out. Immediately he chose young men to the number of a thouland, which had nothing to lose, hardy and desperate to put any thing in execution that they were commanded. These he furnished with Dionyling his all things necessary, and made them great promises: so that he wan their hearts, and got unto him guard, the fouldiers strangers that were in the Syracusians pay. Howbeit he changed the Captains from their Companies, and put in their places fome other made to his hand. And afterwards he fent Dexipus, a wife and valiant Captain LACED. EMONIAN, back again into his Countrey, of whom he stood in fear, and perceived he would be a bar in his way to hinder that he went about Over and above that he fent for the fouldiers of the Garifon of Gele, and gathered together all Over and above that he ten for the countries and Rogues that would come and ferve him, judging them to Thieves rogues be fit men to serve the turn he purposed. When he had gotten a great troop of such Rakchels, he and rakchels fit ftraight returned to Syracusa, and lodged his forces in the Arfenal, and then shewed himself assistants for a openly Lord, and Tyrant, without any longer diffimulation. This amazed and grieved the Syra- Tyrant. CUSIANS most extreamly: nevertheless they were enforced to bear this yoak which they could not help, because the Town was full of fouldiers strangers, and for that also they were atraid of the Car-THAGINIANS that were near unto them with a mighty Army. All this happened, Dionylius being but five and twenty years old, in the third year of the ninety three Olympiade, and in the three hundreth feven and fortieth year of the foundation of ROME. Thus you fee how this young man, of a base condition, meanly born, made himself Lord of one of the greatest Commonwealths in the World at that time, and continued this usurpation all the days of his life, which was the space of thirty eight

This being done, he made them all rich and wealthy that aided him in this enterprife, drave out all

This being done, he make them at the many survey by the death before all the people Daphness and those he could find that withstood these his attempts, put to death before all the people Daphness and those he could find that withthout the chiefest men, and of greatest power that were at that time in Syra. Daphacus and Demarchus, two of the chiefest men, and of greatest power that were at that time in Syra. Demarchus pat cusa, and that had most crossed him of all others in the device of his purpose. Afterward, because to death. he would yet strengthen himself the better, he married Hermocrates daughter, a Syracusian Captain, that overcame Nicias and the Athenians, and married his fifter unto Polyxenus, brother in law unto Hermocrates. Whilest things passed thus, the CARTHAGINIANS, being masters of AGRIGENTE, after they had spoiled, burnt and razed it, they marched away with their General Himilco, and went and befieged the City of GELE, friend to the SYRACUS IANS, in manner of a like distance from Syracusa and Agrigente, very far in land, when the other two were ports of the fea. The befieged did wonderfull valiantly defend themfelves, their Town being weak and kept by the Citizens onely, accompanied with their wives and children that would not forfake them. Dionysius hearing of their necessity, brought a strong aid unto them of thirty thousand footmen, and a thousand horse, besides a great number of Gallies, that lay off and on upon the Isle, to cut off victuals from Himileo, and to land also. But when they came to joyn, Dionylius having divided his bands into three troops to trouble his enemy the more, he could not do fo well but the CARTHAGINIANS had the better, and flew many of his men. He very hardly escaping with his troop entred into the Town, and there called his friends together to counfel what they were best to do. They feeing the place dangerous, and of great disadvantage to hazard battle in, gave him counsell to retire again. He fent a Trumpet over night to Himileo, to pray him to surcease arms till the morning, that he might gather the dead bodies together to bury them. In the mean fpace. in the first watch of the night, he made all the people come out of the Town, and dislodged himself Dionysius flyets about midnight, leaving there two thousand men lightly armed, commanding them to make great cowardly out fires and noise, that the enemies might think that he and his men were still in the Town; and that of Gele, they at the break of the day should come to their troops. Dionysius having escaped thus, came unto CAMARINE, a Town half-way betwixt GELE and SYRACUSA, and commanded all the inhabitants to dislodge and come to Syracusa, that they might avoid the cruelties of the Car-THAGINIANS who facked GELE. So, all the inhabitants of these two Towns compelled to leave their houses and Countrey, all the fields and high-ways were full of women, children, and of poor people of the Countrey. This moved the fouldiers against Dionystus, who accused him that he The fouldiers had done this of purpole, that he might more easily seise upon the other Cities of SICILIA, which incensed ashould be destroyed by the barbarous CARTHAGINIANS : and thus they complained one to ano- guinst Dionther of the little aid he had given to the Townsmen of GELE: how the souldiers of his guard had fine. dealt cowardly in their service, and ran away without the loss of a man of theirs, and no body purfued after them. Upon this discontentment, the ITALIAN fouldiers that came out of ITALY, took their journey to return home. And the men of Arms of SICILIA at the first began to lie in wait to kill Dionysius on the way: but seeing that the souldiers of his guard were never from him, nor he from them, they departed all together, and went with fpeed towards Syracusa, and found Dionyfins panor he from them, they departed all together, and went with the fact towards of KACUSA, and follow them that were left there in Garifon, lodged in the place of the Arfenal, who knew nothing what here facked, and the wife had happened before Gele. By this means being entred without refiftance, they facked the parawithed. lace of Dionysim, where they met with great riches, and did so villanously abuse his wife, that for grief she killed her self. But about the time that they departed from the Camp, Dionysius imagining by the way what would follow after this, chofe out certain footmen and horfemen which he ing of the way what would conow after this, and went with all speed possible with them to Syra-thought he might best trust about his person, and went with all speed possible with them to Syracusa, supposing he should not overcome these men of Arms, unless he did as they. And even as he thought, fo it came to pass: for they perfwading themselves that Dionysius could not well tell what courie to take, whether to follow them, or to keep with his Army: thought they had won all, and walked up and down the Town telling stories of the cowardliness of Dionysius: who haon, and wanted up and advantage at one journey, came about midnight to the Gates of ving marched well near nineteen leagues at one journey, came about midnight to the Gates of ACRADINE, with about an hundred horse and six hundred footmen: and finding it shut, caused ftore of Fagots, Reeds, and Sedge of the Fennes to be laid against the Gare, wherewith the Syra-CUSIANS use to burn their Lime, and which they found there ready at hand. Whilft this Gate was burning, his menthat could not follow him fo faft, arrived one after another. And fo the Gare being burnt he entred, and found in the Market-place some of these men of Arms, who in haste had set themselves in order of battle: but on the sudden they were engaged, and killed with pikes and darts, Dionyfius on the other fide, he ran through the Town, putting them all to the fword he met here and there in the streets, that were running to aid their men. And not staying so, he entred into their houses whom he knew to be his enemies, killed fome of them, and drave others out of the City. The reft of the men of Arms fled, some here, some there, and the next morning all his force arrived at Syra-CUSA. But they of GELE, and of CAMARINE being angry with him, went into the City of the

The Carbasi-nian by reason NIANS, enforced Himileo to fend an Herald unto Syracus A to demand peace. Dionysimaccepted it very willingly. So peace was concluded, that the CARTHAGINIANS should have the SICANIANS, besides all the Towns which they had before the War in their power: That they of SELINONTE, of AGRIGENTE, of HIMERE, of GELE, and of CAMARINE, might return home to their houses, dwell in their Countrey, and in their Towns without walls, paying a certain yearly tribute unto the CARTHAGINIANS: That the LEONTINES, those of Mes-SINA and all other the SICILIANS should be free, and enjoy their liberties and priviledges: That the SYRACUSIANS should remain under the government of Dionysus: That the prisoners and Gallies taken in this War should be restored again on either side. By means of this peace Dionyfiu got the Carthaginians out of Sicilia, established his principality surer then ever, and married again two other Wivestogether: the one a stranger of the City of LOCRES, called cond marriage Dorie: the other of Syracusa called Aristomache, the daughter of Hipparinus the chief man of with two wives all the Citizens. He asked a wife of them of RHEGE, but they refused him, and fcorned his tyranny; of whom he was cruelly revenged, as we will tell you hereafter. It is reported that hemarried them both in one day, and it was never known which of them he knew first : for the rest, that ever afterwards he shewed them both a like savour. They did ordinarily eat together with him, and both of them by turns lay with him. They of Syracus a were destrous that his wife of Syracus a should be preferred before the stranger. But Doris had this good hap, to bring forth Disnyfus eldest son : which served his turn well to defend himself, that she was a Foraigner. Aristomache to the contrary was married a long time to Dionyfus and had no children though he was very defirous to have one by her: Infomuch that he put Dorss mother to death, charging her that the had by charms and forceries kept back Aristomache from conceiving. But afterwards he had children, to wit, two fors, Nifeus, and Hipparinus : and two daughters, Arete, and Sophrofyne. Dionyfies the younger, married his fifter Sophrofyne; and Arete was married unto Thearides, brother to Dionyfius the elder. and her second husband was Dion, the brother of Aristomache. Furthermore, confidering that the Disophus fotti- SYRACUSIANS being delivered from the War of the CARTHAGINIANS, thould have leifure to think to recover their liberty again: and perceiving that the quarter they called the 1sle was stronger of fituation, and easier to keep then any other of the three: he enclosed it in with a ftrongwall from the reft, and built there many great and high Towers, Palaces to keep his Courts, Hallsforhis Counsel and publick assemblies, goodly Galleries, and spacious Gatehouses to contain a great number of people. And to retire himself unto upon any sudden motion of the common people, he built a marvellous strong Castle, within the compass whereof he enclosed the Arsenal, where might lie in dock threefcore Galleys: and there was a Gate also to shut to, into the which could enter but one Galley at a time. Then chusing out the goodlieft and best place of all the territory of Syracusa, hedivided it among his friends, and gave it unto them that had charge of men of War under him. That which remained, he distributed by equal portions unto other inhabitants of the Town, as well naturall born Citizens, as strangers, come from other parts to dwell at SYRACUSA, concluding under the name of Citizens the bondmen enfranchifed, whom he called the new Burgeffes: and distributed to the people also the houses of Syracusa, those reserved of the quarter of the Isle, which he gave unto his friends and fouldiers.

So having as he thought well affured his effate, he began to make War upon the free Cities of St-CILIA, under the colour that they favoured the CARTHAGINIANS. HERBESSE, a City in against the free firm land near unto the mountains, in the heart of the Countrey, was the first he attempted, and Cities of Stir went and besieged it. But the Syracusians that were a great number in his Army, and well appointed, began to have fecret meetings, and to blame themselves, for that they joyned not with the men of Arms to drive out this Tyrant. He whom Dionysius had given them for their Captain called Doriem, was aware of their conferences, and threatned one that spake louder then the others:

who replied to fiercely, again, that the Captain came to him! in choler to fittike him : but his companions took the quartell, and did fo contest against him, that they killed the Captain in the place. Then flirring up their fellow Citizens to recover their liberty, they fent for the men of Arms of the Syracus LA MS who were retired into the fort of Act NE. Dionyfine amazed with this Dionyfine foulchange, presently raised his sleges and with all expedition took his way towards Syracusa, that diers mutiny, he might be there firth. After he was gone, those that had mining chose them for their leaders that him. had killed Captain Doracnes, went and encamped themselves with the men of Arms before Syra a cusa in a place called Epipoies to make War with the Tyrant, having stopped all the passages that he could not come out into the field. And forthwish they fent to them of RHEG Band ME'S SINA, to pray them to fend them aid : which they obtained, to wit, ninety Gallies well appointed. Furthermore, they promifed by open proclamation, a good fum of money to him that would kill the Tyrant : and to the ftrangers that were in pay, to make them Burgeffes as themselves, if they would take their part against him. They provided Engines of battery to beat down the walls of the Isle, and every day gave new affaults onto them, and made very much of all the fouldiers frangers that thou their part.
Whereupon Dionyling leeing himself shut, out of the field, and that his men for fook him every hour, affembled his friends to confult with them what was to be done. Some counfelled him to tarry, alledging that tyranny and absolute power usurped by him, was a fair Tomb. Polyxemus his brother was of the mind, that he should save himself on the swiftest horse he had in his stable, in the lands which the CARTHAGINIANS held in SICILIA. But Philiftes who afterwards wrote the flory of his geft, faid then, that Dionysius should neither fly away, nor yield up his eyranny, the which he should never forgo but by force, and his feer forward. Dionyline took hold of this Dionyline refolopinion, and refolved with himself to abide all extreamity, rather then to yield up his place. But verh to abide in this case he fortuned to come to see a Butcher slaughter an Ox, and having observed that at one all extremity ftroke he fell down stark dead : Alas, faid he, were it not a great shame that for fear of death which rather then fly lafteth fo little while, and is fo foon gone; I should leave fo goodly and great a Seigniory? But knowing what people he had to deal withall, he fent Ambaffadors unto them that kept him in fo ftraights ly, to befeech them to permit him with fafety to come out of the Town with his followers. Even at that inftant he fent men to the fouldiers CAMPANIANS, to promife them all that they would have The double fo they would come and beliege Syria cusa. The Townsmen having suffered him to go his war with dealing of DIfive thips, flept quietly in hope that he would be gone : and cathiered a part of their fouldiers, fund on five. poling they should need no longer to beliege it. So that their souldiers dispersed themselves here and there in the fields, even as if the gyranny had been put down. But the CAMPANIANS allured by Dionylius promifes, came into the field, and being come to AGYRIDE, they left their carriage. to be so much the soonen before SYRACUSA. They were twelve hundred horsemen, and made such fpeed, that they surprised the SYRA CUSIANS, and in despite of them rode through the Town unto the Castle of Dionysius, in whose aid also at the very same time there arrived by sea, three hundred other fouldiers; fo that now he became more couragious then ever he was, The Syracus IANS on the other fide began to difarm themselves, some being of one mind, some of another: which Dionyfiss understanding, he made a fally out upon them that kept the quarter called NEAPOLIS, or new Town, and put them all to flight; howbeit many were not killed; for Dionylius riding every where about, willed his men to kill none that fled. Thus were the SYRACUSIANS driven and difperfed in the field, where there gathered about the horsemen above seven thousand. Now for Dion fine, he having caused them to be buried that were slain in this conflict, he fent Ambassadors unto AT NE to them that were retired thither, to intreat them to be at peace, and to return home pionificial to their houses, promising them by oath, that he would never be revenged for any thing they had eth peace of practifed or done against him. Those that had wives and children at Synacus a, were compelled them of Aint to pruft to his words and promifes. But when the Ambaffadors alledged to the others, the humanity of their mafter in burying the dead : they answered, that the Tyrant deserved to have as much done to him, and that they prayed the gods they might quickly requite him. For all this they would not fir out of E T NE, expecting opportunity to the upon their enemy: who being escaped from so greate danger, he courtequily used them that returned, to entire the others to follow. And for the rest, after he had well payed the CAMPANIANS, he put them out of the City, suspecting their inconstancy and treason. They departing from Syracusa, went unto the City of ATELLE. where they prevailed fo much, that they were received into the Town to dwell there. But their wickedness burst out into such extremity, that one night; they set upon the naturall inhabitants, kil- Treacherous led every man that was able to bear Arms, and afterwards by force thrust out their Wives: and by ingratitude: this means made themselves masters of the Town, and of all the territory thereabout. At the same time Ariffus, one of the chiefelt men of LACEDEMON was fent unto Syradus as upon a rumour given out among the people, that it was to drive our the Tyrant; but the effect thewed that it was but to negociate with him, and to bind him unto them, to ferve their turns in their affairs. Ari-I'm then immediately after his arrival having had fecret conference with Dionylius, he began to mutiny with the SYRACUSIANS promiting them all the aid he could for the recovery of their liberty. But Ariflus ameans alterwards he himself killed Nicoreles the Coranthian, who had promised the Syracustans to threngthen to be the head of this greenprife : and acculing them that gave credit to his words, he made the Tyrant the Tyrant more hold and ftronger then ever. So did he also begin to thew himself more then before a for he found the means to fend the Synacustans into the fields to get in their corn and harveft, and in the mean space whilest they were out of the City, he went into the houses himself, and fetched

bourers to

out all their arms that had any. Then he environed his Caftle round about with another fecond wall, built divers fhips, and affembled a greater number of fouldiers ftrangers, whom he afterwards entertained. Now he thinking himself too little a Lord, undertook to conquer fome frontier Towns near unto the territory of the SYRACUSIANS, and before he would affail them, he brought his Army before ETNE, which he wan prefently. From thence he came to befiege the City of the LEONTINES, the which having refifted him, after he had forraged and preyed the Country about, he turned unto the Towns of the naturall SICILIANS, making as though he meant to fet upon them, to the end that those of CATANE, and of NAXE, seeing the War in another place, should care the less for themselves. So being near unto the Town of Enne, he put into Limnessus head, a Citizen of the same, that he should take upon him to make himself Lord of the Distoflies wind Town, promiting him to help him in it: which the other executed. Howbeit he kept the Town for neth Town by handle and have be Comparation. himself, and shut the Gates against Dionyjus: who being angry with this repulse, counselled the Ennants to drive out this new Tyrant. The people being set on by him, ran one day in arms into the Market-place, and cryed, Liberty. Dionyfus understanding that, followed with some of his faithfull friends, took hold of Limneftus , and delivered him to the ENNIANS , and went our of the Town again immediately, to make others to trust him. From thence he went unto CATANE, and wan the Town through the treason of Arcesilans Captain of the same: took all the arms from the inhabitants, and left a good Garifon there. Procles Captain of NAXE, shortly after, played even the like part that Arcefilans had done, and was well recompensed for it; and all his kinfmen and friends were given him : but the other inhabitants were fold by the drum, their Town deftroyed, and their lands given to the SICILIANS, neighbours to SYRACUSA. For those of CATANE, they were also fold to them that would give most within SYRACUSA, and their Town given to the fouldiers CAMPANIANS. This made the LEONTINES hold up their hands, leave the Town, and to dwell at Syracusa. Now Dionysius fortified Syracusa anew, and having determined to close in the quarter called Epipoles with walls, he affembled threefcore thousand labourers diftributed by troops, and ferving skilfull mafters, accompanied with Masons that had their day-work. These men encouraged by his presence, by his promises and gifts, finished the wall in three weeks of a reasonable height and thickness, being little less then two leagues about. The banished men of Syracus a being fled to RHEGE, did what they could possible to move the inhabitants to make War against Dienysu. They laboured it so well, that in the end the RHEGIANS went into the field, and induced the Governors of Massina to keep them company. But a Massinian called Leomedon, having discouraged the troops, every one went home again, and did nothing: and as for Dionyfiss, he looked no further into them, but the RHEGIANS and MESSENIANS having fent unto hint to treat of peace, he judging that the friendship of these two Cities would be very expedient for him, made peace with them. So having affured himself on that fide, and considering that many GREEKS of SICILIA field into the Towns which were subject to the CARTHAGINIANS, and that there were Towns untouched, unto the which they carried their goods: he thought that fo long as he was at peace with them, divers of his subjects would be willing to do the like. Howbeit that in making War with them, those whom the CARTHAGINIANS should overcome by arms, would come to his side. Furthermore, word was brought him that CARTHAGE was wonderfully afflicted with the plague, which did the more strengthen him in his resolution. But knowing that he had to deal with mighty parations against the Cor- enemies of all the people of Europs, and that this War would not fo foon be ended: he gathered together into SYRACUSA out of all the coafts of ITALY, of GREECE, and of SICILIA, the best workmen and artificers, unto whom he gave great wages, and great gifts unto those that were most skilfull and diligent. Who labouring in envy the one of the other, they built up in ashort time two hundred Gallies, repaired an hundred and ten that had ferved a long time, forged an hundred and forty thousand bucklers or targets, fo many swords and daggers, as many helmets and fallets: fourteen thousand corcelets, curaces, and brigandines of all forts: Engines of battery of all fashions, and of darts, an incredible and uneftimable number. Touching the Galleys, to arm them with Pilots, Mariners, and Galley-flaves, the City of SYRACUSA furnished for the one half: and Dionyfine for the other half payed the fouldiers ftrangers. The furniture of these ships, arms, and harness being ready, he began to gather his Army together, and would not for saving charges put himself in readiness before. He gathered together within Syracus all those that were able to bear arms: he drew out of the Towns subject unto him, all that were meet for War: he levyed men out of LACONIA with confent of the Lords of SPARTA, and got a great number out of all parts because he payed well, and gave them very gracious entertainment that came to serve him. But above all the rest he showed himself a marvellous friend to the RHEGIANS, and MESSENIANS, that had a reasonable strong Army in readiness to be employed: being as raid that so soon as they should fee the CARTHAGINIANS passed into SICILIA, they would joyn with them: for to which fide foever these two Cities would encline, they would help to make a great weight in the ballance, and to bring the victory to fall on their fide. It was at that time that he gave a great Country of extent unto the MESSENIANS, and prayed the RHEGIANS to give him a wife of their Town. But they would not hear of that in any wife. Whereupon he went to the LODRIANS, who gave him her of whom we have spoken before : and for many days together did nothing else but make banquets and feafts, as well to his fouldiers, as unto the more part of the Citizens of SyracusA. For he had now changed his first sowrenes and cruelty of a Tyrant into gentlenes: he did use his subjects in a more civil fort, put no more of them to death, nor banished any mo of them, as he did at the first beginning. Shortly after this marriage was past, he affembled the people of Syna-CUSA, and did perswade them to make War with the CARTHAGINIANS, telling them that they were enemies of all the universall GREEKS, and of those especially that dwelt in SICI-LIA. whom they practifed by all the means they could, to make subject unto them. And that albeit they did not now make any alteration, it was because of the plague that tormented them much: but so soon as they were free from that, they should see the effects of their malice against all the inhabitants of SICILIA, which they cast long before in their minds. And that it were better for him, fince it must needs be, soon or late, to begin to make War upon them, they being now weak, then to tarry till they were recovered again: and that it was a great shame to them to suffer Dionysius his the Towns of GREECE To near unto them, to be made subject to barbarous people : that being perswassions desirous to recover their liberty, so much more willing they would be to yield themselves unto the SYRACUSIANS, fo foon as they should see that it were open War. These and other reasons were the Cartheeinireceived and allowed by the Syracusians, who were no less desirous then himself to make War ans. with them. For they hated the CARTHAGINIANS, because that for fear of them they were constrained to put themselves under the yoak. And next, for that they hoped Dionysius would use them more gently, so long as on the one side he should be afraid of the force of the enemies, and on the other, of the rebellion of those, whom by force he kept under. And especially above the rest, for that they hoped being armed, if occasion were offered, they might one day stand for the recove-

War being concluded upon in this affembly, Dionysius suffered the Syracustans to spoil the PHENICIANS that trafficked in their haven : which they executed out of hand, The other SICILIANS did as much: fo that the CARTHAGINIANS were driven to run away, and those that they could catch were cruelly handled in every place, for the hatred they bare them, because of the proud parts they committed in the Wars past. Dionysius having all his Army in readinels, lent a Herauld unto CARTHAGE with letters, containing that the SYRACUSIANS had de- War denouncreed in their Council to make War upon the CARTHAGINIANS, unless they departed from ced against the Towns of GREECE, which they held in SICILIA, and did leave them at liberty. The Senate Carthage. and people of CARTHAGE amazed at it, knew that they had to fight with Dionylius, neverthes less they resolved to take arms, and sent to levy men out of all parts: Dionysius on the other fide, he took the field with an Army of fourfcore thousand fighting men of foot, and three thoufand horse: and had at the sea near two hundred Gallies and ships of Oars, accompanied with five hundred great thips of burden, full of all forts of Engines of battery, and of necessary munitions for such an Army. All the Towns almost of SICILIA yielded themselves unto him, faving Mo-TYE, ANCYRE, Soles, EGESTE, PALERME, and ENTELLE. Leptines his brother and Admirall, lay before MOTYE, and befieged it: and himself spoiled all the Countrey of the SOLENTI-NES, PALERMITANS, and ANCIREIANS: and belieged EGESTE, and ENTELLE, and gave them diversaffaults. News being brought unto him that Himileo was at hand, he went and encamped before MOTYE, a Town fituated within a little Isle of Sicilia, half a league from firm land, stately built, and very rich at that time. The which he assaulted by sea and by land. drave Hinilco and his forces back, and wan the Town by affault: but they fold their lives and Town very dear, having killed a great number of the enemies, before they were forced. The SICILIANS yet angry in their hearts for the mischies they had endured through the insolency of the CARTHAGINIANS in the former Wars: were so brued in blood, that all those of Mo- The inhabi-TYE were put to the fword. They that faved themselves in the Temples, had their lives granted tants of Motre them: but Dionysius made them all be fold by the drum. Whilest he was occupied there, the flain. EGESTANS made a fally upon the Camp which he had left before the Town, and fet it on fire, which burnt the most part of his souldiers, and the rest well armed, faved themselves as they could. Bur Dionysius not much regarding this loss, set upon all the Towns of the CARTHAGINIANS with his Army. They for their part, gave all the authority and power to Himileo, to prepare for this War of SICILIA. He made an Army of three hundred thousand footmen, and of a great number of horsemen, and gave the rendezvous to the ships of burthen at PALERME: where he arrived with his Fleet of Gallies that followed him. The Admirall Leptines having descryed his coming, fet forward with his ships, and fought with them in the main fea: he killed five thousand of his men, funk fifty ships, and two hundred Carts of War : and the rest of them saved themselves by flying. But Himileo having landed his Army, went and affailed MOTYE, and wan it again of the Syri RACUSIANS.

At that time Dionysius was before EGESTE, where word being brought him of the arrival of the CARTHAGINIANS, and of the taking again of MOTYE, he began to be afraid, and to take advice to return to Syracusa: he commanded the SICILIANS to retire, and made their Dionysius flieth lands wast, to disadvantage their enemies by so much the more. This sudden change of Dionysias, ing his huge was cause that many of his friends took part with Himileo, who seeing his affairs prosper so well, Army of three made his Army march to MESSINE: took in (passing by) the Isle and town of LYPARE: and hundred thouthen befieged the MESSINEANS fo straightly, that in the end he wan the Town by affault, fand men. And there having tefreshed his troops, he razed the Town to the very ground, the which did Message won o much amaze the SICILIANS, that all, except the ASSARINS, turned unto the CAR- the Carbage THAGINIANS. Dionysius being at his wits end for to many losses, did fortifie the nians.

NE, that twen in the field with four and thirty thouland footmen, and a thouland horfe, and fible, he went into the field with four and thirty thouland footmen, and a thouland horfe, and lote, no went into the field want four the banified men of Syracusa were placed, favoured by lodged under the mount Taur, where the banified men of Syracusa were placed, favoured by the Carthaginians, and had fortified it, and made it in form of a Town: whileft he made his abode there, news came unto him that the Army of the CARTHAGINIANS was divided into two, and that the one part of them went by land to CATANE with Himileo; and the other came towards him by fea, led by Mago. He hoping to make this Fleet as nothing,

Lepines lofeth commanded his brother Lepines to make out with his shipping against Mago. But Lepines was put Lepines lofeth communicacion in ordinar and the lofs of twenty thousand men, and well near an hundred of his ships. This twenty thouto mgu, wan un to so a fear, doubting besides lest Mago sollowing his victory should draw towards Syracusa, which was easie to be won having no Garison in it: he retired into his City, and from thence fent men into ITALY and into GREECE, to pray aid against the to his Chy, and from the total the control of the c Himitobelies Syracusa, belieged it by land and by fea, wan the fuburbs of Acradine, and fet up his DYRACUSA, Delinger and James Olympian, all the other Temples of the Suburbs having been paymon in the temple of Inpute of In of their friends under the conduct of Pharacidas, a Captain of the LACEDEMONIANS. With of their files of the thips of burthen, Dionysius put to the sea to get victuals. But now whilst he this aid, and an the imps of building, producting arefull to look to their City, and fpying out all occasions to mitchief the besiegers: they described a boat that brought Corn to the Camp our an occasions to minute our Camp of Himileo. Whereupon on the fudden they armed all their Galleys, and fought fo valiantly with the CARTHAGINIANS, that they took their Admirall with twenty others, and funk four of them, and followed the reft that fled, unto the very place where their ships lay at Anchor within the great haven, provoking them to battle. But the CARTHAGINIANS aftonied with this over-ftrong holds that were in the territory of the LEONTINES, fent the CAMPANIANS to ET-

NE, that dwelt in the Town of CATANE; and taking order for his affairs the best he could pos-throw, ftirred not.

Then the SYRACUSIANS fathened the Galleys prifoners unto the poops of theirs, and brought them into the City. Whereupon they being couragious again for this little advantage they had of their enemies: they began to talk among themselves, how the Tyrant had been many times over-The Syracas Come, and that they to the contrary without him had overcome the CARTHAGINIANS. And The System come, and that they to the contrary without that had overcome the CARTHAGINIANS. And are confined thereupon gathering together by troops, they went fpeaking one to another, that they were gainst Dissipase weary with ferving a Tyrant, and now specially having means to put him down for ever: For, gainst Dissipase weary with ferving a Tyrant, and now specially having means to put him down for ever: For, before they were distanted, but now by reason of the Wars they had their Arms in their bands. Notwithstanding they daily held this talk, Dionysius made the people to assemble, and praised them highly for the good fervice they had done, perfuading them furthermore to be of good courage, for within few days he would make an end of this War. But as the affembly of the people was ready to go their way, Theodorm a Syracusian, judged to be one of the beft men of arms within the Town, stepped up, and made a long Oration, in the which after he had by piece-meal laid open all the tyrannies, cowardliness, and wicked deeds of Dionysim, whom he called Grammarian, Clerk, a careleis man, ignorant of the affairs of War, oppreffor of all Sicilia, and favourer of all thieves and ill men of the world: he perfivaded them by divers reasons to endeavour themselves to recover their liberty. And fince that their allies of ITALY and GREECE were within the City, that they should bring back again the power and authority to create such Captains as they should think good, into the hands of the Chizens, according to the tenure of their ancient laws, or elfe into the hands of their anceftors and first founders, which were the CORINTHIANS: or at the leaft into the LACEDENONTANS hands, who had then the feigniority of all GREECE. The SYRACUSTANS being marvellously moved with fuch a speech, beheld the countenance of their Confederates Affiftants in this Affembly: untill fuch a time as Pharacidas being gotten up into the spartate collected Pulpit for Orations, made every man hearken, supposing it should be he that should begin first to the designs of the integral of the designs of the integral of the integra the dengns of the system first up and encourage others to the recovery of their liberty. But to the contrary, he being particularly friend to Dionysius, began to tell them, that his Lord had fent him to aid the Syracu-SIANS and Dionyshus against the CARTHAGINIANS, not to destroy them, nor to abolish his eflate. This speech being clean contrary to that the common people expected, the fouldiers strangers ran straight about him. Whereupon the SYRACUSIANS stirred not, saving that to themselves they curied the LACEDEMONIANS, because that heretofore they had sent them Ariffin, who pretending he came to aid them for to recover their liberty, was a traitor and fold them; and now that this Pharacidas had broken the hearts of their courages, being well disposed to root out this tyranny. For Dionysius he spake smoothly for the time, being throughly asraid they would have set upon him, and so dismissed the assembly, using the most gracious words unto them he could possibly. To others he gave presents, he sent for others to come and eat with him at Table. In the mean time the The Carbagi- plague strangely possest the Camp of the CARTHAGINIANS, and in a short time killed well near a hundred and fifty thouland of them: whereupon the most part of them were for faken alive and dead, the contagion was to horrible. Some imputed it partly to the discommodity of the place, and excessive number of men living as it were on heaps together; partly unto the vengeance of God punishing their pride, the insolencies, cruelties, and sacriledges of the CARTHAGINIANS. Dionysius understanding of this mifery, would not vainly let slip such a fit occasion, but armed fourscore Galleys, under the conduct of Pharacidas and Leptines, and his troops, with whom he affailed Himileo by

Sea and by Land, took his Forts, burnt and drowned the most part of his Ships, brake the rest. and gave his reople of Syracusa means to fet upon the little Barks, and to flut them within the and gave To be short, he brought them to such extremity; that they fent secretly unto him to pray him to luffer that which was faved from the overthrow the day before, to pass the Sea, and to retire The Carthagihim to lutter that which was tayed from the overland with the preference of an hundred and four feature him to defend to Africa with fafety: promiting to make him a Preference of an hundred and four fore though the family creates him and Crowns. His answer was, that it was not possible all should be faved, yet he was contented ward. the naturall CARTHAGINIANS should pais. For he doubted much that the Syracusans and their Friends would never fuffer him to respite those other, if they once understood it. But he did it of purpose, being unwilling that the Army of CARTHAGE should be utterly destroyed, for sear Dionystus his that when the SYRACUSANS should see themselves free from this fear, they would remember the sear, Oration of Theodores, and put to all their force to recover their Liberty again. The Money promiled him being delivered, Himileo imbarqued by night all the natural CARTHAGINIANS that were left into forty Galleys, and made Sail immediatly towards Africk. Howbeit he was feant out of the Haven, but certain CORINTHIANS perceived his stealing away, and suddenly came to tell it to Dionyfius, who feeming to be very greatly bufied, commanded to found the Alarum, and that the Captains should prepare themselves to follow him. The CORINTHIANS seeing he went but family to work, would tarry no longer, but even at the present hour embarqued themselves, drew up their Ankers, and rowed hard after their Enemies : fothat in a short space they overtook the Rear of their Vessels, and so rudely hurt them, that they sunk some of them. Immediatly after, Dionyfius drew his Army into the Field : but the SICILIANS, friends unto the CARTHA-GINIANS, had gotten the frart before crofting the countrey, infomuch that the more part of them got home to their Houles. For this cause Dionysius having left a Guard to keep the passages by the High-ways, he brought his Army back again to the Enemies Camp. The barbarous People feeing themselves betrayed by the Generall, forlaken of the naturall CARTHAGINIANS and Si-CILIANS, their hearts were killed, and began to flie, stealing away, some this way, some that way: but all of them in manner fell into the hands of Souldiers that guarded the High-ways. Those that were left came before Dionysius, and casting down their Arms, befought him to take pity of them, and to fave their lives: the Spaniards onely excepted, who gathered themselves together with heir Arms, and fent unto him to offer their Service, if it would please him to accept them: thewhich he did, and received them into pay among the Souldiers Strangers. For the rest, he took the other Prisoners, and gave their baggage in prey to his Souldiers. For Himileo, after he had niconici Princicis, and Solve Carthage, he died diffract of his wits. Dionysius having driven the CARTHAGINIANS out of SICILIA, he built up MESSINA again which they had ruined. Then he went to besiege TAUROMENION, fortified by the SICI-LIANS, who luftily gave him the repulse, and made a Salley upon him, and killed the most part of his men, having much ado to escape himself. Oo the other side, Mago chief of the Africans in SICILIA, did courteously intreat his Allies, and received into his protection all those whom Dionifius oppressed. By which occasion having won the hearts of the most part of them, he became so ftrong in a short time, that he got a great Army again on foot, marched with them to MESSI-NA, and over ran all the plain Countrey; where having gotten a great booty, he took upon him to befiege the ABACENIANS Confederates of Dionysius: who being bound to aid them, he went Dionysius overagainst the Carthagnians, beat Mago in a Conssict, and killed eight hundred of his men, throwen Ma-So having brought his Troops to SYRACUSA and refreshed them, he armed a Fleet of an hundred go, and warreth So having brought his 1700ps to 34 RACUSA and territorial to their Haven by night; at that against them Veffels, to go and make War with those of RHEGE, and coming to their Haven by night; at that against them. instant time he did fiercely affail them, set fire on their Gates, and set up scaling-Ladders in divers parts; nevertheless the RHEGIANS defended themselves so couragiously, that he was forced to retire. And thereupon receiving certain intelligence what great Preparations they made at CAR-THAGE to begin the War again : he left RHEGE, and returned again to SYRACUSA. So the Peace conclu-CARTHAGINIANS had gotten together again fourscore thousand men, whom they sent into ded with Con-SICILIA under the conduct of Mago. But before they came to joyn with the Enemies , they ditions. concluded Peace with these Conditions, that every one should enjoy that they had gotten: That one of them should not quarrell with the other for any thing : That Dionyfius might without breach of Peace make War with the TAUROMENITANS. These being thus agreed upon between them , Dionyfius went and befreged TAUROMENION the fecond time, and did more furiously affault it then before: fo that in the end, after long refistance of them that were besieged, he wan the Town, drave out the Sicilians that dwelt there, and did replenish it with Strangers whom he kept in pay. Afterwards because his Army should not be idle and mutinous, he chose twenty thousand Footmen, and three thousand Horse, and went into ITALY with them, next adjoyning unto SICILIA, to subdue those GREEKS which had dwelt there of long time. News being brought unto them of Dionyfins intention, they affembled all the Estates of the Countrey of CROTONE, where they all refolved to joyn together to repulse this common Enemy; and making all the Forces they could , established Eloris a banished man of Syracus a their Chieftain, they made their Army march against Dionysius, who camped before the City of Calone. He understanding of their coming, raised his Siege suddenly to go and meet with them; and the next morning after his departure, by break of the day ..., he gave Charge upon the GREEKS

Yet contrary to all mens expectation, he used them very courteously, and sent them home safe without Ransome. After he had won this goodly Victory , he led his Army into the Territory of the RHEGIANS , whom he hated to the death. They having no friends, and too weak of themselves to result such a mighty Enemy, were constrained to make Peace with him with very hard Conditions. For he made them give him threefcore Galleys, an hundred and fourfcore thouland Crowns, and for hostage and observation of other Articles, an hundred of the chiefest of the Town. From thence he returned to befrege Caulo-NA , and held them fo straight, that he wan it by affault, destroyed it, and gave the Lands unto them But forasmuch as he could not forget the unreconciliable hatred he bare unto the RHEGIANS, he

he would fee the end of it. And where before he had made Peace with them, it was not for any good will he bare them, nor that he desired their triendship, but because he would take their Galleys from them, hoping that after he had left them bare at the Sea, he should come closer to them, and have them at his discretion. Therefore whilest he was in lTALY, he sought nothing else but to take an occasion to make War with them, so that he might not be charged, that contrary to his faith he had broken the Edict of Pacification. Having therefore led his Army unto the Straight, making as though he would pass into SICILIA, he fent unto the RHEGIANS to demand Victuals for his Army, promiting to fend them fo much again upon his return to SYRACUSA. Which he did, to the end that if they refused, he might excuse himself well if he did set upon them and if they did give him any, it should then turn to the hurt of the Town, which if it came to be befieged, should be constrained for famine to hold up their hands to him. The RHEGIANS that leaft doubted his malice, furnished him with Victuals for certain days: but perceiving he tarried there too long, now counterfeiting he was fick, then that he used other delays to prolong time, they began to fee his fetches, and refused to victuall him any more Thereupon he feigning to be much offended, fent them home their Hostages, and came to beliege the Town: and coming hard to their Walls, made daily and continual Affaults, beating upon the Walls with great Engines which he had made expressely of an incredible greatness. They having chosen a valiant man for their Captain, called Physon, and furnished all those that were able to bear Arms in the Town, they defended themselves couragiously, and did many ways hurt their Enemies: and specially in a Salley they made, Dionysias was fore hurt with a Launce in the flank, that he was like to haveded, but being recovered and well again, he purfued his purpose more obstinately then ever: whereby he took all hope of aid from them, and having continued Siege there eleven Moneths all together, in the end the RHEGIANS found themselves in great want of Victual of all fors: for a bulhel of Wheat was at fifty Crowns. After that all kind of Corn failed them, first they did eat up their Horfes, and all kind of Beafts of burthen. Then when they had no more to eat, they did feeth all their Hides and Leather they could find in the Town, and so lived a while. And last of all, coming out of the Town, they did eat and devour up such Hearbs and Roots as they could find by their Walls, even as wild Beafts. Dionyssus perceiving it, in stead of pitying of them (nay rather defiring they should eat one another of them) he caused the Grass to be cut down, and put his Beafts in the Camp into it, to feed of all that was along the Town The Rheglass Walls and Ditches, to the end they should have nothing more to eat. So that in the end the overcome, and poor RHEGIANS overcome by necessity, were constrained to yeeld themselves and their Town their City 12 to the diferetion of the Tyrant. Who being entred into the Town, found heaps of bodies dead of that Plague of Famine: and fuch as were yet alive, feemed rather ghofts then living per-

after, he made the Father to be tied to the highest Engine of Battery he had, and sent to tell him news of the death of his Son. He was happier by a day then his Father, faid Physon: who was drawn all the Town over, and whipped most shamefully : having a Strieam at his back that cried out aloud, that Dionyfins made him be whipped thus, because he had made the RREGIANS take Arms against him. But Physon that had shewed himself like a valiant Captain and worthy man in this Siege, and had lived honourably all his life time, did patiently indure the pain which the Tyrant made him suffer. For he remained constant, speaking out aloud that every body heard him:

That he was put to death, because he would not betray his Countrey, and deliver it into the Ty-

His conffancy was fuch that it moved Discipling Souldiers to compaffion : who began already to

to the ground.

Thus have we made a large Discourse of the practises and Wars of Dionysius. Now let us speak fomething of his private Government. He had wit enough, but troubled with many vices: and the The private more he grew in years, the more it was corrupted. The Flatterers made an end of his destruction: carriage of for they called his cruelty, the hate of wicked men, and good justice; and made him believe that he Flatterers the was a most worthy man in all things: insomuch that he thought himself the onely man of the bane of Prin-World and would be fo reputed. Being thus carried, and feeing himfelf at good leifure, he entred ces. into a course which he had somewhat discontinued during the Wars, and therewith he was strangely raken; which was, to write Verses, and to make Tragedies. He fell to this study again with more diligence then before, and fent for Poets out of all parts, whom he honoured, and gave Prefents unto. because they should correct his Works of Poetry. They seeking to gratifie him for their profit said nothing but that which they thought should be most pleasing unto him : so that being pust up with their flatteries, he gloried more in his Verses, then he did in his Wars. Now amongst other Poets that followed him, there was one they called Philoxenus, a learned man, and excellent to write Hymns in praise of the gods. Dionysius one day gave him a Tragedie of his to peruse and correct: he croffed it all over from one end to the other: and one night being asked what he thought of certain Poelies which the Tyrant made, he spake openly, that they were worth nothing. He answered tain Poeties which the Trians angrily faid, it was of envy that he cenfured his Works to, and fent him Truth procuforthwith to dig in the Quarry-pit. The next morning his friends intreated Dionystus to pardon him, reth it felt which he did: and would have him again to Supper with many others of his fort. In the midft of hatred. this Feaft , Dionyfiss that defired nothing more then to have his Verses heard, rehearsed some of them, and of those especially which he thought best done. Then turning himself to Philoxenss, he The constancy asked his opinion. But he answered him never a word, but looking about him, called one of Dio- of Philosenus. nyline Guard, and faid unto him : Carry me again to the Quarry-pit. Dionyline stilling at it , bare this nip well; and foon after taking Philoxenss apart, periwaded him not to be fo fharp. His friends alfo told him that he might eafily forbear to speak so freely to no purpose. Then Philoxenus made him an answer all new, saying, that from thenceforth he would keep such a weight on his words. that he would speak the truth, and keep himself in Dionysius savour, as he did. For Dionysius having rehearfed certain Verses full of great lamentations, to move the hearts of the hearers to pity, he prayed Philoxenus to fay his mind of them: who answered him, that those Verses had filled him full of pity. It was a sharp gird of mockery which Diony fine perceived not, no more then that which Melanthins spake of a Tragedie after the like fort, that he could not see it, it was so dark of speech. And fo was Plato not much better used then Philoxenus. Dion his Disciple and Brother-in-law of Dionylim, had spoken so much good to this Tyrant, that being at leisure he was contented to see Plato. and to hear him. So they being together, their talk generally was all of Vertue : but chiefly they disputed, what was true force and prowess? Where Plato proved unto him, that Tyrants were nothing less then valiant men. Out of that, turning his talk to speak of Justice : he shewed him that the life of the just was very happy: and that to the contrary, the life of unjust men was most wicked. Infomuch that the Tyrant feeing himfelf convinced, could no longer endure talk with him: and was Dionyfius diffiforry to fee those that were present so much to esteem of him, and to take such singular pleasure to king Plato who hear him speak. So at the last his choler being up, he asked him, what business had brought him spake truth, into Sicilia? To feek an honest man, faid Plato. And how? (replied Dionysius) by the gods be fold. (to hear thee speak) it seemeth thou hast yet found none. Dion thought his choler should go no turther, and so sent Plato away in a Galley, whom Polis Captain of LACED. MNN brought back again into Greece. But Dionysius prayed this Captain secretly, that what sower he did he should kill Plate by the way, or at leastwife fell him : adding to this jest withall, He shall be never a whit the worse for that: for if he be a just man, he shall be as happy being a Servant as otherwise. And so Plato was fold in the Isle of ÆGINE for the price of two hundred Crowns, and afterwards bought again by Annicerius a Philosopher, and sent to ATHENS. Dioryfius gave himself to all Poesie, and sent for the best Singers he could recover in the Games Olympials, to rehearfe and fing his Verses before the People. The Singers at the beginning were heard with admiration of every body, for the goodness and fineness of their voices : but when they came to examine their Songs, they were despited, mocked, and whiteled at, which angred him extreamly when he heard of it. So this passionate desire did so much increase in his head continually, that he became almost as a man beside himself: and said that his faithfull friends did envie him, and began to be at defiance with them, as if they had been Traytours unto him. To conclude, this fury of his did fo poffels him, that he did put many to death upon false occasions, and banished others, as Philistus, and Leptines his Brother, both of them valiant men, and that had done him great Service in his Wars. Howbeit afterwards he fent for them again, and they were his friends as before. But fince we are now totalk of his cruelties, let us fay fomething as we pass by. One of his greatest friends called Marfyu, dreamed one night that he cut his throat. The Tyrant understanding of it, put The cruckies this poor Dreamer to death : alledging that this Dream could not have come to him at night, but of Dienyfins. that he had it fetled in his mind to commit fuch an act in the day. Leptines being defirous one day to describe SICILIA in his presence, took a Halbard from one of the Souldiers of his Guard, and with the butt end of it drew on the ground that which he would : wherewith Dionyfins was fo angry, that he bitterly took up Leptines, and put the Souldier to death that had given him his Halbard. Dioryfins one day being disposed to disport himself some way, gave his Bardasse his Sword and his Cloak to keep: which one of his familiars perceiving, faid: And what, do you trust this young Boy with your life? The Youth began to smile at it; but Dionysius made him be killed , because by smiling he feemed to allow of this word: and he also dispatched the other, because he had shewed him the mean to kill him. He was determined to have put his Brother-in-law Polyxemus to death; but

hehaving an inkling of it, fled out of SICILIA. Dionyfius fent to Tefcha his Sifter, and chid with her, because she had kept his flying away close from him. But she answered him with a bold coun-A bold answer tenance: What thinkest thou, Dionysus, that I am a woman so cowardly and faint-hearted, that if I of refea, Dir had known that my Husband would have gone , I would not have taken Sea with him , and have been companion of his fortune? I knew nothing before he was gone, for it had been more honourable for me to have been called the Wife of Polyxemas banished, then Sifter to thee a Tyran. Diosyfins was blank at this speech, and the SYRACUSANS wondered at the vertue of this woman: infomuch that after the Tyranny was deftroyed, they did not leave to do her all the honour that they could have done to a Queen; and when the was dead, all the Citizens by common confent went with her body to the Sepulture. A question being made one day, to wit: Which was the best Copper? Arrisbon answering quickly, that it was that wherewith the ATHENIANS melted the Statues of Armodius and Arifhogiton, Dienysius made him to be strangled, and die in great tormen, They report of him that he spared not his own Mother, but caused her to be strangled, though she wasvery old. And as for his Brother Lepsines, he suffered him to be killed by his Enemies, abeit he might eafily have faved and delivered him at that time. Some talked of his Tyranny in a Barbers Shop, and faid it was well established, and also evill to be destroyed, as the Diamond to be broken. I marvell faid the Barber, finiling, how you fay that of him, upon whose throat I pass my Razour fo often? These words being brought to Dienssius, he hanged the Barber. He had put to death at divers times ten thouland of his Citizens, and though he had written in one of his Tragedies that Tyranny was the Mother of Injustice: notwithstanding he had oftentimes this word in his mouth: That children most be deceived with Playes, and men with fair promises. And he said that the greatest pleasure and contentment he found in all his Government, was, that what he would have done,

One day he would have had Money of the SYRACUSANS: they complained and lamented, befee was fuddenly executed. ching him to hold them excufed, telling him they had no Money. He to the contrary, made them to be asked by others: which he did twice or thrice one after another. And as he continued ftill urging of them yet further: it was told him they did nothing but laugh, as they walked in the Market-place. Then he commanded his Receivers to prefs them no more: for it is a fign, faid he, that they have no more, fince they make no account of us. His mother being past age to marry, would needs marry a young man. He answered her, that indeed it was in his power to break the Laws of Syracusa, but of Nature, not. He severely punishing all other Malefactours, pardoned Thieves that took away mens Gowns and Cloaks whom they met by night in the streets: to the end that for this cause the SYRACUSANS should leave to make Feasts and Assemblies, wherein they could not keep themselves from speaking and complotting against him. On a time a Stranger promised him aloud to teach him fecretly, how he should know those that did practise any thing against him. Dienysius prayed him very earnestly. So the other going to him, Give me faid he, fix hundred Crowns, that the Syra-Cus ans may think thou haft learned of me the figns to discover the Conspiratours. He gave them him , and feigned that he had learned thefe means of him: greatly commending the fubrill fathion to get Money which this man had invented. Having heard one day a man that played upon the Cithern passing well, he openly promised him the sum of fix hundred Crowns. The next morning he came to demand this fum: Dionysus told him: thou gavest me great pleasure yesterday to hear thee play: and so did I thee in making thee this promise; and so thou were paid in the Field for the pleafure thou gavest me, by that that thou receivedst. One asked him on a time, If he were not idle. God forbid, faid he, that that should ever happen to me. He being informed that two young men of the City drinking together, had spoken many evill words of him and his Tyranny at the Table: fent to invice them both to supper with him: and seeing that the one after he had drunk a little, said and did many foolish things: and that the other to the contrary was very sober, and drank but feldom: he pardoned the one, as being a Drunkard and infolent of nature, and that through drunkenness had spoken evill of him : but he put the other to death, as one that bare him evill will in his hear, and being Enemy unto him of fet purpole. Some of his familiars reproved him, because he had honoured and advanced a wicked man, and evill beloved of the Syracusans. And he answered them , I will that there shall be one in SYRACUSA, that shall yet be more hated then my felf. Once he fent Presents unto certain Ambassadours of Corinth, which came unto him. They resuled them, because they had a Statute in their Common-wealth, that did forbid Ambassadours to take or receive any Gitts or Prefents of Lord or Prince whatloever. He was difcontented withall, and told them that they did evill to take away that onely good which is in Tyrannies, that is, to have power to give: but they taught men also, that to receive any good of Tyrants, is a thing one should fear and thun. Being informed that a Townsman of Synacus a had hidden a Treasure in the ground Disonflut Pre- in his hoofe, he commanded him to bring it him: the which he did, but not all for all that, for he referved a part, with the which he went and dwelt in another Town, and bought fome Land there: which when he understood, he sent for him to come to him, and restored him all his Gold and Silver: Sincethou knoweft now, faid he, how to use Riches, and not to make that unprofitable which is

Yea his Brother and his own Son were fain to put off their Clothes, and the Guard of his Chamber should come naked whatsoever he was that put his foot into it : then there was another Garment cast upon him. He was afraid of his own Son as much as of any other, doubting that when he felt his own comage, and frequented men of understanding, he would make fome complor against him, and in the end thrust him our of his Seat and Seigniory. He locked him up in a Chamber, and would fuffer no man to come and speak with him : where for lack of other occupations, this young man occupied himself to make little Coaches or Chariots, Candlesticks. Saddles, Stools, and Tables of Wood. Nevertheless, after he had some more liberty, and that his Father began to let him come abroad : he straight grew to be proud and diffolure as might be. him rather vigan to termitroin above. In Theorem 2015, the when he had raviffed a Townfmans Wife by force, his Tather being angry with him a saed him: Whether ever he find feen him do any fuch thing or not? the Son aniwered him: No more had you a Father that was a Tyrant; But Dionysias replied upon him again: So Dionyshus nive thalt thou never have a Son at all, if thou leavest not to play these wicked parts. Another time pinely answergoing to fee his Son in his Lodging, and feeing there great frore of Veffels of Gold and Silver, he ed by his Son, told him: there is nothing in thee of a Lord or Frince, fince I have given thee fuch a deal of Gold. and Silver Plate, and yet thou knowest not how to get a Friend. It was an ordinary thing with Dionyfins to tell wonders, and do little, being so exceeding timorous. But specially after the execution of his Barber, and that his Daughters were now waxen great, he would not abide that any should clip Dionyflus fearhis hair with Sizers: but he made an Image-maker of Images of Earth to come to him, who with a ing the Barbers burning coal burnt his glib round about his head. Now he made himself to be known by a memo-sizers, fing burning coal burnt his glib round about his head. rable fact he did: which was this. A certain Flatterer called Daniecles, praifing the Majetty and with a coal, Riches of Dionysius, and the Magnificence of his Palace, maintained that the Sun never faw a more happy man. Dionysius to make him partaker of this felicity, made him sit down upon a little Bed. very sumptuous, and inriched with wonderfull precious things. Then he caused them to set up Tables laden with Veffels of Gold and Silver, and covered with wonderfull dainty Meats, a number of fine Pages attending on his Service, Perfumes passing rare and most excellent sweet for the Chamber. and dainty Musick both with Voice and Instruments. To be short, all the Pleasures and Pastimes possible to be thought of, did compass this Minion of Court round about. But in the midst of all pointer to the unique, of the point of the managed of the point of the point of the parties of the parties of a faffened to a small hair of a Horse, and to be hanged right over Damoeles head: who forgetting this flatterer well felicity he had so much commended, besought Dionyjius it might quickly be taken away. And like served. ashe was cruell unto then, fo did he shew himself a despiser of his proper gods, whereof we will alledge some examples: Having sacked the Pemple of Proscripine in the City of Lockes, he Dionstan Sa-took the Sea, and liaving a gale of wind at pleasure: You see, said he, how the immortall gods criticoges. do favour Sacriledges. He took off a Cloak of fine Gold from Jupiter Olympian, in the Town of Syracusa, which Cloak weighed fourfcore and five Talents, which are more worth then fifty thousand Crowns, and gave him another of Woollen, saying: that the Cloak of Gold was too cold for Winter, and too heavy for Summer: and that the Woollen Cloak would be more convenient in both seasons. He rounded also the Statue of Apollo, which had aglib of Gold. And finding that Money went low with him, by reason of his great expences in the Wars he had against the CARTHAGINIANS, he took the Sea with a Fleet of threefcore Galleys, with pretence to fet upon Pirates, but indeed it was to spoil a Temple of great fame, full of goodly and rich Jewels that had been offered up there, the which was leated upon the edge of the quarter of the City of Thus-CAN, called AGYLLE. Being arrived there in the night, and having landed his men: in the morming by break of day he suddenly and without any danger executed his Enterprize. For the place being guarded with some few men, he easily forced it, and afterwards at his leifure sacked the Temple, where he got to the fum of fix hundred thousand Crowns. Which the Townsmen understanding. came out upon him straight, to see if they could defend the Temple: but he overcame them in Battell, and having taken a great number of Prisoners, he spoiled all their Countrey, and then returned to SYRACUSA, where he fold his Prisoners and his Booty, for the which he had also three hundred thousand Crowns more.

So being now well stored again, he began to set up an Army: and because he saw the Towns Dionyline pre-Subject unto the CARTHAGINIANS willing to revolt, he did intice them, and used them very pareth War graciously that came and took his part. The CARTHAGINIANS hearing that, fent unto him to against the demand their Towns, otherwise they proclaimed War against him. So on both sides they came Garthaginians. into the Field. For the CARTHAGINIANS, they dispatched Mago into SICILIA with a great Army. Dionysim being afraid of nothing, marched before with his Troops, and being camped near to a place called CABALES: both the Armies fiercely gave Charge upon each other, and after a long Mago a Car-Fight Mago was flain in the place with ten thouland of his men, and five thouland taken Priloners. The thaginian Cap-CARTHAGINIANS were not discouraged for all this, but chose them again the Son of Mago for tain with ten their chief Captain, a young Gentleman, wife, couragious, and valiant. So after they had stayed Dio- thousand of nyfins by a Truce for a certain time, the tearm being expired, they presented him a Battell, and fought his men slain; it out fo resolutely, that after they had flain his Brother Leptines (whom he forsook at his need)

Diogina over- ver a whit prouder of such a Victory, they sent Ambassadours unto him that concluded a Peace for their advantage. For beside the Towns that remained unto them, Dionysius paid them six hundred thousand Crowns to defray their charges in the Wars. Also he kept not this Peace long, but brake it shortly after: for understanding that the Plague was not amongst the CARTHAGINIANS, and that they were fallen out amongst themselves, he took advantage of this occasion, and to give colour to his pretence, gave it out, that the AFRICAN Souldiers had foraged the Lands of his friends, whereupon he leavied an Army of thirty thouland Footmen and three thouland Horfe: with this Army he began to make War again, and in the first imployment of his Forces he wan SELINON-TEAND ENTELLIE: and after that he marched to LILYBEE to besiege it : but seeing it well guarded, he returned back again. Hereupon news was brought him, that fire had taken some of the Arfenals of the CARTHAGINIANS : wherefore supposing all their Ships of War had been Diosphus ever- burnt, he began to scoff at all their Forces. But they having armed upon a sudden a Fleet of two hundred Galleys, affailed unlooked for a hundred and thirty of Dionyfiu Galleys, which wintered in the Haven of Ealx, fome of them he funk, and brought away the others. After this 105 Dionysim retired into Syracusa, and fell very sick. The which Dion perceiving, entred into talk of his Children, and of his Sifter Aristomache. But the Physitians to curry favour with young Dicnyhu, hindered him that he could have no fit time to fay any thing to him. Or as Timau writth, they gave him drink (as he had commanded them) to make him sleep , and by this means took from him his fenses, joyning death with sleep. Some others say, that he was killed by his Guard: others, that he was poiloned. But Diodorus the SICILIAN setteth down the cause after another fort : which is this. He caused, said he, a little before, a Tragedy of his intituled, The LENEI-ANS, to be plaid at ATHENS: and having gotten the Victory, one of the Mulicians brought him word of it by Sea: which did so please him, that after he had richly rewarded the Messenger, he made a great Sacrifice to the gods to give them thanks for his Prosperity, and sumptuous Feafts, unto the which he invited all his friends, and drank fo largely, that he fell into a great fickness whereof he died. Now he had in time paft an Oracle, that had foretold he should die then, when he had overcome those that should be worthier then himself. He applied this Oracle to the CARTHA-GINIA NS, supposing it was meant by them, because they were stronger then he. This was the cause that oftentimes in the Battels he had won against them, he being Victor, fled, or willingly suffered himself to be overcome because of this Prediction. Howbeit he could not shun his destiny: for being an ill Poet, he was judged by the sentence of corrupt Judges, to have excelled all the other Potsbetter then even the was: and then came he to end his days, as the Oracle had foretold him. Now though he had reigned the fpace of thirty eight years full out, and had boafted many times that he would leave his Son a Principality chained with ftrong chains of a Diamond: this young Disnyfus ruled no long time, but being thorrly after driven out of SYRACUSA by the Inhabitants themfelves, secondly by Dien, and at the last by Timoleon, who overthrew him altogether: he was fent to CORINTH, where he ended the reft of his days in mifery. Afterwards the SYRACUS ANS, maintaining their liberty for the space of twenty years : they fell into Agathocles hands, who also committed terrible cruelties. After his death, they being full of civil diffention, demanded aid of Pirrbut King of Epirus against the CARTHAGINIANS. He having made a Journey into Si-CILIA, was constrained to leave it, and had great War with the ROMANS. By reason whereof the Syracusans willingly yeelded themselves unro Hieron the second of that name, under whom (a great friend of the ROMANS) they prospered the space of fifty years. But after his death, his little Son Hieroniums, a young Lord and unruly, took part with the CARTHAGI-NIANS: and having reigned onely fifteen Moneths, he was killed by his Guard. Now for that his death brought on great confusions, and that the SYRACUSANS enclined to the CARTHAGINIANS part: the Confull Marcellus went to beliege SYRACUSA, and took it in the fecond year of the one into subjection hundred forty and two Olympiade. So that afterwards it was governed by Prators, and according to the ROMANS Law, even to the declination of their Empire.

THE LIFE OF OCTAVIUS CÆSAR AUGUSTUS.

Anno Mundi. 3991.

Thy Youeb Augustus, and thy tongues good gift, Thy Valour , Wildom, and thy worthy Feats, Thy Countreys Love, thy Laws, and Statues, lift Thy Throne above all other Princely Seats.

(cio, the Daughter of Accins Balbus, and of Julia the Sifter of Julius The descent Cafar, was married unto the Father of this man, whose Life we write of of Angustus, now, and who was descended of the ancient Race of the Octavians, iffued out of the Countrey of the VOISCES, and known at ROME from the time of Tarquinim, and of Servins Tullus. Their Son Ottavins was born in the year of the Confulfhip of Cicero and of Cains Amonim, at that time when as the Conspiracy of Catiline was discovered, and suppresfed. He was called Thurinus: but afterwards, according to the tenor of his Uncles Testament, who made him his Heir, he was called Caise Julins Cafar, and lastly Augustus, by the advice of Munatius Planens, and by the Decree of the Senate. He was but four years old when his Father died, and at twelve years he made the Funerall Oration for his Grandmother Inlia: four years after that, he became a Gownman, though he were but young: yet his Uncle gave him a Prefent at his return out of Africk, fuch as the Souldiers are accustomed to have of their Captains. Shortly after he followed his Uncle into SPAIN, whither he was gone against the Children of Pompey, and passed through many great dangers to overtake him. This War being ended, because Calar undertook better longer Jour-Augustusstudineys, Octavins was lent into the City of A DO OLO NIA: and there plied his Book very diligently, ed at Appolonia And it chanced him, without having any mind to it, that being gone to fee Theegenes a learned Aftronomer, he cast his Nativity, and suddenly he leave being amazed, and honoured him. The which Augustus demade Officion conceive great hope of himfelf, and in memory of this good hap, he caused certain clared himself pieces of Money to be coined, and he himself told the opinion of Thiogener. Being returned from their Suitus Appoionia to Rome, after his Uncle was flain by Cassim, Brum, and their Allies, he declared himself to be his Heir , though his Mother and Marom Philippus were of another mind. And having put himself forward, he governed the Common-wealth of ROME, first with Antonim and Lepidm: afterwards with Amonius the space of twelve years: and laftly himself alone, the space of four and forty years. But before we speak of his Government of common Affairs Augustus ruled in time of Peace and War, let us fay somewhat (after Switonius) of his Family and his manners, alone forty He married being yet very young the Danghter of Publim Servilim Ifauricus : but having made four years.

Peace with Antonius after the War of Murine, and at the request of their Armies, who were destrous to see their friends, he married with Capia, the Dapanter of Publius Cledius and of Ful-via then Wife of Antonius. But before he knew her he sent her to her Mother, with whom he Augusturfus was forecontart discontented, and because of the War of Perouse. Immediately he married Augustatiorsa- was somewhat uncontented as and because the was too troublesome: yet he had a Daughter by her king his Wives Seribbath, and kept not her, long, because the was too troublesome: yet he had a Daughter by her king his wives of the owner, and nepr not the first part of the took another which he loved unto the end; and that was Limatried Livis, called Julia. But for faking her, he took another which he loved unto the end; and that was Limatried Livis, called Julia. whom he loved via Drufilla the Wife of Tiberius Nero, whom he carried with him great with child as she was, and had no more children by her but one, and yet she went not out her time, and it had no life. His Daughter Julia was married unto Marcellus, the Son of his Sifter Ottavia : and after his death unto Marciu Agrippa, by whom the had three Sons, Cains, Lucius, and Agrippa: and quan unto Marcii Agrippia, oy whom are use lines sons, cams, came, ame experips; and two Daughters, fulia, and Agrippine. After the death of Marcis Agripps, he chole to his Sonin-law Tiberius the Son of Tiberius Nero, and Livia Drufilla, at that time a Knight of ROME, and compelled him to forfake his Wife Vipfamia, of whom he had a Son called Drufas. But ashe and compened militororiane in water of the Common-wealth, fo was he unfortunate in his Race; for his Daughter and his Niece Julia committed fo foul faults in ROME, that he was constrained to banish them. Agrippine was married unto Germanicus, the Son of his Sisters Daughter. Cains and

Lucius died in leis then a year and a half one after another: whereupon he adopted his Nephew Agrippa, and his Son-in-law Tiberius. But because Agrippa was of a churlish nature and unhonest, the did diffinerit him, and confined him to Surrentum. His Necce Julia had a Child after the Augustus man- was banished, but he would not know it, nor suffer it should be brought up. He was very modest ners in his pri- and continent in all the parts of his life, faving that he was fomewhat given to Women and play: for the rest, he liked not great Palaces, but was contented with mean Lodgings: and if there were any Ornament, it was in Porches and Parks. His Houshold-stuff and Apparell was nothing sumptious nor coftly. It pleased him well to make Feasts; he very carefully made choise of his Guests, and oftentimes he face down at the Table a long time after every body, and would rife before others, which remained after he was up. In his ordinary diet he banified superfluity of Means, he delighted to be merry and pleafant among his friends, or to bring in pleafant Players of Comedies to pals the time away. And he did not tie himfelf to any certain hours to eat his meat, but when his flomach ferved him he took fomething. So that fometimes he supped not at all, and then whenevery man was gone, he made them bring him meat, neither dainty nor delicate. Also he drunk very little Wine, he slept in the day, and by times in the night, talking with some, or reading: so that oftentiates he steps in the break of day, and for that he took no rest in the night, he gight chance to fleep in his Litter as they carried him in the ftreets in the day time up and down ROME. He was a goodly Prince, and that kept himself in good state from the beginning of his life to the latter end : not curious to fet himself out , as little taring to be shaven , as to wear long hair: and inftead of a looking-glass, reading in his Book, or writing, even whileft the Barber wastrimming of him. Whether he fpake or held his peace, he had fo comely a face, that many of his Enemies bent to do him hurt, their hearts would not ferve them so soon as ever they looked on him. He had very clear and lively eyes, but with time he was subject to many diseases and infirmities, What exercites the which he remedied with great care. As for his exercites; he left Arms and Horses immediately for Angular arely after the Civill Wars: for he was never any great Souldier. He would play at Tennis, at the Ballone, he would go abroad in his Coach to walk and stir himself. Sometimes he would go a fifthing, or play at the Bones, or at Nuts with young children of the Moors and Syrlars that had fome pretty manner and behaviour with them, and always fpake words to move laughter. He was learned in the Liberall Sciences, very eloquent, and defirous to learn: infomuch that during the War of MUTINE, in the middeft of all his infinite Affairs, he did read, he wrote, and made Orations among this familiars. He never spake unto the Senate nor People, nor to his Souldiers, but he had first written and premeditated that he would fay unto them, although he had speech at commandment, to propound or answer to any thing in the Field. And because he would not deceive his memory, or lofe time in superfluous speech ; be determined ever to write all that the would fay: and he was the first inventer of it. If he had to confer with any man, or with his Wife in any matters of importance: he would put that down in his writing Tables, because he would speak neither more nor less. And he took pleasure to pronounce his words with a sweet voice and good grace, having continually about him for this purpole a fine man to frame his voice. But one day having a pain in his mouth, he made his Oration to the People by an He rauld. He made many Books and Verses of diversalors; but all is dead with the time. His speech was as the reft of his life, eloquent, well couched together, and fententious. He delighted to read good Authours, but he gathered nothing other then the Sentences teaching good manners: and having written them out word by word, he gave out a Copie of them to his Familiars; and fent them about to the Governours of Provinces, and to the Magistrates of Rome and of other Cities. He was somewhat, and too much given to Divinations: he was marvellously, alraid of Thunder and Lightning: he had a great confidence in Dreams, and in fuch like vanities. But peradventure we are too curious fearching out his private life: yet that may fometime discover great personages more then their publick actions, in the which they are more carefull to frame their countenances, and do fo many notable things, unless a man would make a great Book of them. This is to be noted in him, that fo young a man having fo small beginnings, coming out of a mean House in comparison of others, hath excelled all other young and old men in wildom and greatness of courage: thould rife so high, that before he had been Prator, the Senate gave him the name of Augustus, created him Mafter of the Horse, when as yet he never had charge of a Company of men at Arms: proclaimed him Emperour and Soveraign Captain, afore he had been placed in any publick Office by Authority of the Senate. Furthermore, for the first time he was chosen Confull when he was but twenty years old : and he was thirteen times Confull, and twenty times called Soveraign Captain. Afterwards, when he was not yet four and thirty years old; the Senate and People of ROME gave him this goodly name of Father of his Countrey, because he had maintained and preferred the Common-wealth. It is a wonderfull thing that he could wind himself out of fo many great Affairs and Wars, that he could within four and twenty years of age, reftore again into fo good estate the Common-wealth of ROME, turmoiled and troubled with so many. Proscriptions and Civill Wars at it was. And that afterwards fo long as he commanded alone, he did so firmly eftablish this Monarchy, that notwithstanding the infinite troubles received under other Emperours, yet it stood upright and in so great prosperity for so many hundred years. After the death of Julius Cefar, this man being but bare eighteen years old, came to ROME, where he was welcomed , and immediately did contest with Antonius, hated of Cicero and of many others : from whence the advancement of this young Cafar came; and the declaration of the War against Antonius judged an Enemy of the Common-wealth, and overcome by the Confuls Histus and Panfis. Cefar who was their Affociate, was called Soveraign Captain, though he had not yet fought: both the Consuls being dead of their hurts. But the Senare after this overthrow, beginning to change their mind, he perceiving that they were flow to grant him the Confulfhip, refolved to poffels it by force of Arms, and began to acquaint himself with Antonius and Lepidus which were joyned together: he made that the Souldiers promifed by Oath the one to the other, that they would fight against none of Colurs Troops, and sent four hundred men to Rome to ask for him, in the name of all the Army, the Office of Confull. They having delivered their charge unto the Senate, Cornelius, the Centiner chief of this Legation or Ambassade, perceiving they would give him no prefent answer, casting up his Cassock and shewing the Senate the Pommell of his Sword, said unto them: This shall do it, if you will not do it. So they being returned without obtaining their demand, Cefar made Antonius and Lepidus come into ITALY, and he for his part having passed the River of Rubicon, marched with eight Legions right to Rome. This put all Rome in such a fear, Angashus obas they fent to Cefer to prefent him the Confulfhip: and twice fo much in gift, as they had promit tainen him fed the Legions. Now whilest the Ambassadours were on their way, the Senatours beginning again Consulthip by totake heart to them, encouraged by the arrivall of the Legions of AFRICK, they determined to force of Aims. try all means before they would betray the Liberty of their Countrey, being minded to call back that which they had fent to Cafar, and fo disposed themselves to make War. Cafar being offended with this inconstancy, sent certain Horsemen before, to affure the People that he would make no tumult at all : he drew his Legions near, and made himfelf Lord of Rome without one stroke stricken: and contrariwise, the People and Senate received him with shew of great joy. Then, in the Affembly of all the People he was chosen Confull, just at the full accomplishment of twenty years of his age. So he demanded in the Field, that they should proceed criminally against those that had killed his Father Cefar. Q. Pedius his fellow Confull published the Decree. So were Brutus and Cassiss, and all their friends condemned, with interdiction of water and fire. But forasmuch as Angustus had too small means to set upon Brutus and Cassius, he reconciled Antonius and Lepidus with the Senate, and made alliance with them, followed with great Armies. They joyned, and were in consultation of their Affairs the space of three days together, near unto BOLONIA, or unto MUTINE: and as if the ROMAN Empire had been their own Inheritance, they divided it between them three. So that Cafar had the high and base Lybia, with Sicilia and SARDI-NIA. SPAIN and GAUL NARBONENSE fell unto Lepidus: and the rest of GAUL was for Antonius. They did decree also that they should be called Triumv.ri, appointed for the reeftablishment of the Common-wealth, with Soveraign Authority for five years, to dispose and pilat, Legive the Estates and Offices to whom they thought good, without asking advice of the Senate or towing joint-People. So they established Lepidus Consult for the year following, in the place of Decimus Bru-Rulers. that was killed : and they gave him the Guard of ROME and ITALY , fo long as they two that remained made their Preparations to go against Brutus and Cassius. Besides the Presents they should make unto the Souldiers after the Victory, they promifed them to give them leave to eafe themselves, and eighteen rich Towns in ITALY for them to dwell in. Then they began to fet up a Roll of all the Citizens of ROME appointed by them to be flain. And they decreed to every Freeman that should bring the Trium-viri a head of the Proscripts, the sum of two thousand five hundred Crowns, and half fo much unto the Slaves with enfranchifement: and the like fum allo to who. Amonius and foever could discover any man that had hidden as favoured the Description. foever could discover any man that had hidden or favoured the Proscripts. Antonins and Lepidus thours of a were thought to be the chief Authors of this horrible Tragedie: and Cafer feemed willing to none bloudy Trabut to the murderers of his Father, and did a long time oppose himself against the other two: but at gedy. the leagth he gave over, and they made wonderfull changes, abandoning their own Parents and Friends the one to the other, to be revenged of their Enemies. But when the Sword was once drawn he was no less cruell then the other two. Cicero was not forgotten, as we may see in his Life ;

and it would be very hard to describe the wickedness of that time, the which like a surious stream carried away formany Citizens of ROME. In whole History do appear most rare examples of all forts of Vices and Vertues in all manner of persons: of whom we will make mention, after those that have Wife and fage written more at large: as amongst others, Appianus Alexandrinus: which will ferve to shew, how much a man is a furious Beaft, being lift up in Authority in the Common-wealth, and given to revenge, That there is nothing certain nor fure in mans prosperity, which bringeth much envy to his Servants; as to the contrary, advertity maketh the afficied contemptible, and every body alhamed of them. But they are wife men, that in fuch Tragicall accidents do carry an invincible heart, refolutely obeying necellity, and a more high Providence then that of man. We must not call that intolerable which may happen to great or mean men: for all human accidents are under the feet of Vertue. It chanceth often that force and wildom do defend a man, as always these two Vertues do preserve his Ho-

Then was the gate open to all villanies and cruelties, fought withall by patience and nity 50- and fidelity: but the examples will thew that better then all the discourse a man can make. Salvius Otho, Tribune of the Feople, was one of the first: who having invited his friends to his last Supper, a Centener came in , and in the prefence of all his Guefts , half dead for fear , strake off his head. Minutius the Prator was also killed, sitting in his Seat of Judgement. L. Villius Annalis, a man that had been Confull, being escaped out of the hands of the murderers, faved himself in the Suburbes in a little houle of one of his Clients : but his own Son having no patience to flay for the Inheritance of his Father, bewrayed him unto the Souldiers, who went to kill him there. Shortly cides jully puaiter, this Parricide being drunk had a quarrell with the felf-fame Souldiers, who stabled him in with their Daggers. C. Toranius was betrayed in like manner by his own Son, who having confumed in a few days the Succession which he had so execrably pursued, and being condemned for their, was banished into a place were he died for want and poverty. Now against these wicked, let us fet fome vertuous Children. 2. Citero was hid by his Son, whom they could never make confels (though he was tormented) where his Father was: who, nor able any longer to endure they should afflict so vertuous a Son with so many evils for his sake, came and presented himself to the murtherers. The Son began to intreat them to kill him before his Father : but they were both killed at one time. The Eguaces, Father and Son, one imbracing the other, were both run through and slain at one blow. C. Hofidins Geta was buried for dead by his Son : who saved him, sustained and kept him till it was peace. Arrantins, after he had comforted and strengthened his Son, pur himself to the Swords of the murtherers. The Son died immediatly after for grief, and famine. Some other Children carefully faved and kept their Fathers, and hid them, Certain Women also shewed themselves marvellous faithfull and loving to their Husbands and fo were there to the contrary, fome unfaithfull, that discovered their wonderfull wickedness. their husbands Tanufia made fuch earnest fuit, that she obtained grace of Cafar for T. Junius her Husband, or other unclus. who was hidden by Philopamen his Bondman enfranchifed : whom Cefar Knighted for his fidelity to his Master. Q Ligarius having been kept by his Wise, was discovered by a Slave, and killed: wherefore his Wife killed her felf with famine. Lucretius Vefpillo , having erred and run in great danger here and there, not knowing whither to flie, came fecretly to his Wife Thuria, and was hidden and kept close betwirt the seeling and the top of the House, until she had obtained his grace of the Trium-vivi. Apulcius was faved by his Wife, who fled with him. The Wife of Am us wrapped up her Husband in Coverlets, and made him be carried to the Sea as a Packet of Stuff, where he imbarqued, and failed into Sicilia. Coponius was faved by his Wife, who put her Honour afide in respect of her Husbands life: for fhe lent her body one night unto Aumins to preserve him (which she did by that means) whom she loved better then her felf. Now to the contrary, some women unfaithfull to their Husbands, delivered them into the hands of the nurtherers, because they might marry again. Amongst other, the Wife of Septimius having shamefully given her body unto one of Antenius familiars , the caused her Husband to be put in the number of the Proferipts, that the might more easily continue her adultery : and fo was Septimins pur to death. Q. Vettius Salassus, was hidden in a sure privie place, wherewith he acquainted his Wife; but she straight revealed him to the murderers. The which he perceiving from a high place where he was, cast himself down headlong, choosing rather to die so, then to make his cruell Wife pastime. Futivins was discovered by a Slave of his, and his Concubine, jealous because he had married a Wife, and had left her; although notwithstanding he had made her free, and had given her Goods to live withall. Now let us prefently speak of the faithfulnes and unfaithfulnels of Slaves enfranchifed. P. Nafo was betrayed by his Slave freed, with whom he had been too familiar. But he fold his death, for he killed the Traytour with his own hands, and afterward held out his neck to the Hangman. L. Lucceius had put into the hands of two of his Slaves manumiffed, as much as was necessary to have relieved him in his banishment : but they ran away with all, and he came and put himfelf to the flaughter. Haterius, that was in a feeret place, was fold and discovered by a Slave of his. Caffin Varus being bewrayed by a Freeman that was his Slave, escaped nevertheles, and hid himself among Reeds: where being found by those of companions: he discovered himself to be a Senator of Rome, but they would not believe him, because he was in poor estate. But whilest they were reasoning of the matter, there cometh a Centener that strake off his head. C. Pletim was faved by his Slaves: but being a man given to perfume and rub himfelf with odoriferous Ointments, the fcent and fmell of them discovered him to the Souldiers who went ferriting up and down in his House : yet could they not find him , but cruelly tormented his Servants, to make them confels where he was: which they could never do. But Plotius having compassion of the evils of his faithfull Slaves, came out of the place where he was hidden, and because he would prolong their life, he shortned his own, and presented himself to the murderers. Appim Clauding, as he was near to be had by the back, changed his Gown with his Slave, who went in that fort to prefent himself to the murtherers: but they took off his head, and so he saved his Some entian-Masters head. Another Slave of Menenius did the like: for he went into his Masters Litter, and chised men offered his neck to the Sword of the murtherers : who dispatched him whilest his Master got to the give their own Port of the Sea, from whence he escaped into SICILIA. But the Slave of Urbining Panopio is wor-lives to fave thy of memory every where: for he hearing the murderers came to feek his Mafter, took his Ma- their Mafters, fters Gown from him and his Ring, gave him his own, and put him out at the back Gate. Then he goeth up into his Mafters Chamber, and lay down upon his Bed, where he boldly attended them that killed him for Panopio. Another shewed himself no less faithfull in the behalf of Antius Reflio: for although his Mafter had throughly thwacked him for his knavish tricks played a few days before, and that then it feemeth he had opportunity to be revenged : he to the contrary imployed himself after a marvellous fashion to fave his Master: for he meeting with an old man in his Journey, strake off his head, and shewing that with his whippings together to the murderers, he made them eafily believe that he had been well revenged of his Master, with whom immediarely after he faved himself in SICILIA. The Slaves of Martin Cenforinus kept him a long ately after ne taven innutes in Science, and Sances of Science Longitums appeared to time, and fo well, that he had leifure to go to Sextus Pomprius. 2. Oppius an honourable old man, and being almost at the pits brink, like to be killed, was referred by his Son, who having scanned by the son, who have some science by the son, who have some science by the son of the sum of of finely gotten him out of Rome, took him upon his shoulders, and afterwards led him into SI-CILIA, where all the poor diffressed ROMANS were gently received : for Pompeius had sent Profitipis, certain Ships to keep upon the Coast of ITALY, and Pinnaces every where, to the end to receive all them that fled on that fide: giving them double recompence that faved a Profeript, and honourable Offices to men that had been Confuls and escaped, comforting and entertaining the others with a most singular courtesie. Many went into MACEDON to Brutus and Cassius: others into AFRICK to Corneficius. Some having escaped the tempest that was in the time of Sylla, were even glutted with this cruelty: as amongst others , M. Fidustius , and Lucius Philuscius. T. Labie- T. Statius Samnis, an honourable Senator, being fourscore years old, because Thieves should have no part of his Goods, he lest them in prey to whosoever would take them : and afterwards fet his House on fire, and burnt himself within it. Aponius being kept a good while by his Slaves, was fo weary to be shut up in a troublesome place, and Straight impriwhere he lived very poorly, that he came out to the Market-place, and held out his throat to the fonment and murtherers. Cestim being possession with the like grief, caused his slaves to make a great fire, and work then then cast himself in it. Balbus was betrayed by a Servant of his, that shortly after was hanged Servant puniupon a Gibbet by Sentence of the People : and fo had his reward for his villanous fact. Antonius did put in the number of the Profcripts a Senator called Nonius Struma, and onely to get out of his hands an Emerald effeemed at fifty thousand Crowns. But Nonius found the means to escape with his Emerald, to the great despight of him that greedily defired this preys. Some valiantly defended themselves, as Atteins Capito, that killed many Souldiers running rudely upon him, thinking he would have suffered himself to be killed as others were. Howbeit after he had fold his flesh dear, he was overcome by multitude of Affailants. Vetulinus aided with his Son, having many times valiantly repulsed the murtherers, he would have faved himself in Sicilia: but in the Straight

he met with such a number of Enemies , that there he was killed. Sicilius Coranus a Senator, was put in the number of proferipts, and because he would not with others condemn Brutus

and Cassius, devising how to escape, he put himself in rank among those that carried a dead

Corps to buriall : but he was discovered and put to death. The Trium-vivi appointed such

CÆSAR AUGUSTUS

To encourage the Soulders, the Trium-viri gave unmeasurable Gifts, granted them daily new Fillage: the Legions wintered in the richeft Towns, who were compelled to feed the Souldiers at their own charge. Furthermore, all the rich men were confirmined to pay in nature of a Tribute at one time, the tenth part of all that they were worth. To be fhort, fo that they could find out new inventions, it was enough to exact Money. For the fear and cuftom to indure all, had falhioned men to be more flaves, then the murderers and exactors would have had them. And to close up all, the Trium viri cauled Money to be coyned, the which on the one fide had the Image of Antonius with an Infeription in Latin , the effect whereof is this: M. Antonius Emperour , Augur , Trumour, for the establishment of the Common-wealth. And on the other side there were three hands joyned together, with the marks of the Confulfhip, and had these words: Salus generis humani, that is to say:

Now during the cruchies of this Triumvivate, Brutus and his Followers, made themselves strong The health of mankind. in Macedon, and did divers exploits of War: and were afterwards overcome in the Fields Phi-LIPPIANS, as hath been said in the Life of Brutm, which we need not rehearse again, the principall being comprehended there. After this Victory, Anionism went into the East to dispose of his Affairs in ASIA, and to leavy Money there to pay his Souldiers, having promifed to every one of them five hundred Crowns. Cefar returned into ITALY to refresh himself, to affigne Colonies to his Souldiers, to pacifie the troubles Lepidus had procured, and to fet a Pike betwist him and Pompey at a need, if he were never so little in league with him. Cefar fell grievoully sick at BRUNDUSIUM: but being recovered again, he entred into ROME, pacified all things, and kept Lepidus in his wonted degree. But when he came to bring his Souldiers into Colonies, then the formbegan to rife : for the Owners cried out that they were tyrannized, being driven out of their Inheritances: the old Souldiers they complained that promifewas nor kept with them. Fulvia and fone others practifed to fet them on, to the end to draw a War into ITALY, and by this means to make Antonius come again, belotted by Cleopatra. These things proceeded so far that Fulvia took Arms, for the was then in the Camp, her Sword by her fide, and commanded like a Cap-Augustus lead-tain. Cafar on the other side being angry, sent her Daughter home to her, unto whom he was eth his Army betrothed, and led his Army against the Nurs I NIANS and SENTINATES the Allies of Fulvia. In the mean space Lucius Antonius departed in the night with speed, and entred into ROME by Ailies of FulTreason: used it as a City taken in War, and drave out Lepidus. Cefar left Sulvidienus to bevisa and after via: and alter fiege the SENTINATES, returned to ROME, and drave out Lucius, followed him and frormed tentate out of his Journey as he was going to GAUL, short him up, and befreged him a great time in Perouse, and compelled him through famine to yeeld himself, and to crave pardon, which he granted him. PEROUSE was burnt by a strange accident; for one of the chiefest of the City having let his House on fire, after he had wounded himself with his Dagger, a boisterous wind being rilen upon it, so dispersed the flames abroad, that it burnt all the Houses desides. Cefar caused some of his Captains to be killed that were against him. He condemned the NURSINIANS in a great sum of Money, and because they could not pay it, he drave them out of their City and Territory. Afterwardshe suppressed some troubles raised in NAPLES by Tiberius Claudius Niro, Father of Tiberius Cefar, and favourer of Fulvia: who freing her felf under Foot, the fled unto ATHENS. But Cofar to prevent a new Conspiracy, sent Lucius Antenius far from Rome, to command the legions that were in Spain: he gave him also Commissioners to look into him, and to observe his actions. He finely drave out Lepidus also into Africk with fix Legions. On the other fide Fuivia being dead, Cafar and Antonius agreed being ready to fight : after that they made Peace and after make with Pompty that governed SICILIA. Immediatly after that he went into GAUL to appeale fome troubles that happened there, and fent Agrippa before, who compelled the Adultans to submit themselves, and pacified all GAUL. On the other side Cneins Calvinns subdued the CE-RETANIANS in Spain. And because the Legions had committed certain insolencies, whereupon they fell together by the ears, and the Enemies had the better hand, after he had sharply reproved them, he took the tenth man of the two first Bands, and belaboured Jubellins with a cudgell.

In the mean time Celar fent at times Troops of men of Armes into Dalmatia and ILLYRIA, to the end to breath them for other Wars that were a hatching, as that of Sicilia was the fift. For Menas the Pirate, Sextus Pompeius Lieutenant, having for despight brought his Fleet unto Ca-Sar, and taken his part, unto whom also he delivered the Isles of SARDINIA and CORSICA, with three legions, Cefar did him great honours, and refused to deliver him again unto Pompey, who asked him of him. Belides that, Pompey complained of Antonias, and pretending to have just occasions, he took Arms again. Wherefore Cafar lent for Antonius and Lepidus out of GREECE and AFRICK, to come to aid him. Amonius cathe to the Haven of BRUNDUSIUM : but upon the fudden, not known wherefore, he took Sea again, and returned from whence he came. Lepidus came too late, which made

But the other Fleet that Cafar himself brought, was wholly overthrown by Pompey, near unto TAUROMENION, and Cafar brought to that extremity. that he was ready to kill himself. But Cornisseus ran to the shoar, who saved him, and brought him Augustus reato the Camp: from whence he retired further off, and very quickly (but with great danger) un-dy to kill himto Massala. After certain encounters where Pompey ever had the better, infomuch as Lepidus felf, is faved was suspected to lean on that side, Cefar resolved to commit all to the hazard of a latter Battell; and by Consiscius. to draw Pompey unto it hecut him to thort of Victuals, that he was conftrained to come to blows and the Fight was very cruell: wherein Agrippa bestirred himself so valiantly, that he wan the S. Pompeius Victory, funk twenty eight ships, brake and spoiled the most par: of the rest, and took two of overcome by the chiefest Captains Pompey had ; one of the which called Demochares , killed himself with his own hands. Now for Pompey, who but a little before had about three hundred and fifty fail, he fied a-way with all fpeed onely with feventeen, and went to Messina fo discouraged, that leaving all hope and his Army he had by land, he went to the Isle of CEPHALONIE, where being somewhat come to himself, he determined to repair to Antonius. But Tifienus a French-man (his Lieutenant of the Army by land) led all his Troops unto Lepidus: fome GREEK Historians report that it was to Cafar. Plemminius was within MESSINA with eight Legions, and did capitulate with Lepidus to render up the Town to him. Whereupon Agrippa happened to come thither: who maintained that they ought to regard Cafar that was absent then. But that stood him in no stead : for Levidus entred the Town, and gave the spoil of it as well to Plemminius Souldiers as to his. Thereupon Cafar undertook a thing worthy of memory, which was: that being unarmed he went into Augustus un-Lepidus Camp and turning by the blows of the Darts that were thrown at him by fome, which armed enterth hit his Cloak and pierced it : he took hold of an Enfigne of a Legion. Then the Souldiers all of into Legidus them armed followed him, and left Lepidus : who shortly after loft Empire and Army : he that with Camp, who twenty Legions promifed himself Sicilia and a great deal more, Cafar gave him his life and the being fortaken Office of foveraign Bishop of ROME, whither he sent him. Some say he was banished : upon these

He dispersed and sent some others to their houses, and gave Legion unto them that had used themselves gently, two thousand Sefterces for every Souldier; which is caffiered for their infolent thought to mount near to fifty Crowns. And shortly after Cafar was chosen Consull the second time : but he resigned the Office the same day unto Autronius Patus, being about to make himself friends against Antonius: who being stayed about Cleopatra, gave his Wife occasion to return from ATHENS to ROME. Now after the fire of enmity betwixt these two Competitours had been a hatching a certain time, it flood either of them both upon, to feek all the means to overthrow his Companion. The strange proceedings of Antonins in favour of Cleopatra hastened the War, where upon followed the Battell of ACTIUM, the flying of these wicked Lovers, and the beginning of the Monarchy of Cafar , confirmed by the Conquest of EGYPT , and the Tragical death of Antonins and Cleopatra. The which we touch briefly, the whole being largely fet down in the Life of Antonius. They did great honours unto Cefar after these exploits. The memory of Antonius was condemned, and his Statues maimed and thrown down to the ground. A little before, M. Lepidus . Son of the Trium-vir and of Junia Sifter of Brutus , conspired against Casar. and condemned to pay twenty Millions of Gold to the People of Rome for a Fine) that he brought down usury from twelve in the hundred, to four; and made that Land and Houses were fold dear where before the rich men had them almost for nothing. Furthermore, he brought in a marvellous change in all trafick: he also abolished all Taxes and Subsidies imposed by necessity of the civill War. He cried down all ftrange Coins, which were at too high a price for their Law, and all through the iniquity of time. He lent out Money for a time without interest, unito those

Being occupied in these matters, Letters came from Crassus, Casars Lieutettant, devertising that he

At this time Casar that was in his fifth Confulship, numbred and mustered all the People of Roms, reformed the Senate, the order of Knights, the distribution of Augustus fee. Corn: and because of the great dearth that was then, he made Corn to be distributed to the Peoteth the Com. pleat a very mean price to lome, and for gramercy to the poor. They that had been bound to the mon-wealth in Common-wealth of too long a time, he discharged them, and burnt their Obligations. He confirmed order the propriety of Houses in strife betwist them and the Common-wealth, if they had been in quiet possession any convenient time. And to assure all those that had adhered unto Antonius, and to keep them that they should no more give ear to any new rumours, he sware unto them in good saith, that having taken Antonius Coffers he had burnt all the Letters he found in them, and read not one of then. He fet down an Order for Cuftome, ealed the Cuftomers that had been too much oppreffed: also he restored the Treasure again, and the Augur of health. And by reason of that above named, he was called Father of the Countrey in open Senate: and at the fame time he fent People to CARTHAGE, to fet upon the Families of the Patricians, greatly diminished by the Proferiptions fullest whether The next year following, which was the feven hundred twenty five of the Foundation of ROME, he were belt to and the fixt of his Confulthip, feeing all the Wars appealed, Peace established, Arms laid down every where, the Common-wealth in good strength, the Laws honoured, Justice in authority, the Senate in their ancient Glory, and the People reftored by him to their rights of Affembly to choose their yearly Magistrates, and to give out their Commissions and Charges according to their old custome: he began to reason the matter with himself, which of the twain was most profitable, either to keep (for the good of the State , and under the Title of a Prince) the Empire which he had in his hands : or whether be should render it up unto the People. He found himself grieved for that Antonius had oftentimes accused him of tyranny and unjust invasion: and on the other part also he apprehended the fury of the People, and the factions of ambitious men, which like the billows of the Sea, would incontinently tofs in horrible fashion this unconstant Sea. Being thus perplexed, one day he took afide Agripps and C. Mecanas, his two faithfull friends, very wife men and of great experience above all others : and prayed them to tell him plainly without flattery, what they thought of it, being relolved to follow that which should be most expedient for the good of the Commonwealth. Agrippa by an ample discourse did counsell him to render up to the People his Principality and figniority. Mecenas was of the contrary opinion, and gave such counfell as Cefar followed, tempering both opinions, and made himself Mattee in such fort that the People felt it not, but rather coniested that they needed such a Physician to faile them up again from the incurable maladies they were fallen into. He thanked both his friends , gave his Neece Marcella to be the Wife of Agrippa, the rule of the did him new honours, proceedeth to a new review of the Citizens of ROME: and is chosen Prince of Common wealth.

The control of the did him new honours, proceedeth to a new review of the Citizens of ROME: and is chosen Prince of the citizens of ROME: and is chosen Prince of the Citizens of ROME: and is chosen Prince of ROM himself that so much good and honours as had been communicated to the small and great, would make them they would not much pass for their ancient Dignifies and Liberty : and that the sweetnels of the eale and reft they did enjoy, would make them forget all the good and evill past : he borrowed of his magnanimity the marvellous counfell that followeth. He refolved to discharge himself of the Principality into the hands of all the Senate, to render it unto the People; hoping that the Senate feeing his affection to to Submit himself to the accustomed order, and not to feek a domination and Government ill-willed, they would thank him the more : that all the great perfons would lay afide the envy which they might bear unto him, and that the People would efteem and love him so much the more. Upon this thought, and after he had acquainted some of the Senatours withall that stood affected to him, to the end to win others by their means. he made an Oration in open Senate, well studied, and fit for the time. Having made a long discourse of the great extent of the Empire, and of his insufficiency, he added unto it, that this common burden could not be carried but by the immortall gods: that he had continued fome years to manage a part of it, and that experience had made him know that his shoulders were too to manage a part is a representation of the principality, subject to infinite changes, and exposed to a thouland ambushes. He therefore required, the City being surnished with to many Noble against affi-Persons, that the affairs might be managed by many men, who joyning themselves together, stants to rule might more easily faishe the charges; then one alone : that in a good hour, having fet all things the Empire. in good estate again, he did put the Common-wealth into the hands of the Senate and People of ROME. This Oration diverfly moved the Senatours. Some of them thought, that there was more Art then Truth in it. Others judged, that it was not expedient to put the estate into the power of many. The most of them enriched and made great by $Cef_{\mu\nu}$, and that were rifen up by the ruines of their Countrey, faid: that they should prefer that which now they had in hand, before all the time past, beaten with so many Tempests. Many others inclined to that side, not that they were in good earnest of that mind, but for fear to be looked upon with an evill eye, if they did speak against their Companions. So then all of them with one consent unadvisedly, rather then of a against their Companions. So that a so that was the waste of the Senare Common and ripe judgement, began to befeech and to adjute Color, that it would pleafe him to The Senare be chief and preferver of the Empire, of the which he had fet down to many goodly and happy Founand the Perple of the Empire, of the which he had fet down to many goodly and happy Founand the Perple of the Empire, of the which he had fet down to many goodly and happy Founand the Perple of the Empire, of the which he had fet down to many goodly and happy Founand the Perple of the Empire, of the which he had fet down to many goodly and happy Founand the Perple of the Empire, of the which he had fet down to many goodly and happy Founand the Perple of the Empire, of the which he had fet down to many goodly and happy Founand the Perple of the Empire, of the which he had fet down to many goodly and happy Founand the Perple of the Empire, of the which he had fet down to many goodly and happy Founand the Perple of the Empire, of the which he had fet down to many goodly and happy Founand the Perple of the Empire, of the which he had fet down to many goodly and happy Founand the Perple of the Empire, of the which he had fet down to many goodly and happy Founand the Perple of the Empire of the White Perple of the Perple of th

Immediately they ordained that Calars Guard should have twice as much pay as they had take the Gobefore, Agrippa was of opinion , that they should cassiere the Spanish Guard, and Cafar in veriment into their place should choose a Guard of ALMAINS, knowing well that in those great bodies there was their hands. little malice hidden, and less subtilty: and that they were a People that took more pleasure to be commanded, then to command.

He being thus established in his Empire by the consent of the Senate and People, to the end they Augustus takes should not think he would lift himself up above measure, or to give sure footing to a perpetual charge of the Monarchy: he would not accept the charge to provide for the affairs of estate, and the Go- Empire for ten vernment of the Provinces, but for the space of ten years : with condition to give up his charge years, before this term, if things were sooner fetled in their full estate. and for himself, he kept those that were not yet in order, and in the which he should be driven to make War. In those that were quiet , he established Pro-Consuls : and for others , he governed them by his Lieutenants, which had their leffon, according unto the which they were bound to be directed. Among other Laws they were forbidden to leavy any Money, or to gather men of War together, or to affail any Province, without the commandment of the Senate. or of Cafar. That forthwith when they fent any Successours, they should leave their Government, and repair to ROME, within three Moneths. He appointed also unto the Pro-Consuls a certain fum of Money to bear their charges for their Horse and Carriage of the stuff. Furthermore he established a Law, that the Pro-Consult or Governour should not go to his Province appointed him, till the end of five years after his Commission granted him : to the end that they which were convinced for taking of Money corruptly, should pay to the Provinces the Fine they should be condemned in : and he deprived them of all estates and honours which through their evil behaviours had been condemned in fuch Fines. And further, he would not that the Officers that had todeal in his affairs should have any Authority, but to demand their Stipends and Money which the Provinces were bound to furnish. And because he would beautifie and adorn Rome, as Augustus rethe Majerly of the Empire required, he raifed up many common buildings, and repaired many paired the City of Rowe. that had been left unfinished or ruined, leaving the Names of the Founders. His Buildings among other were the Temple of Apollo in the Palace, with the Porch, and a Library of Greek and Latine Books. Also the Monuments, and the Park, for the Walks and Pleasure of the People of ROME. In his feventh Confulfhip, certain Senatours propounded that they should call him Remulue, for that he having preferred the City of ROME, it was as much bound unto him, as unto The Name of the first founder. But he would not accept of that Name. Wherefore Munacius Plancus bethought Augustus inhimself of another, the which was given unto him by common consent of all, and he held it to vented by M;

his death: as also we will call him from henceforth in all that remaineth to be set down of his Plantar. deeds: to wit, Augustus. He not to seem unworthy of this Name, and to carry himself so, that no man should repent his change of Government, began diligently to fet his hand to these affairs. And to cur off all Suits, he forbad them to make any Roll of Suiters Names, but of those that had laid down great Sums of Money, to the end that being convinced of their Suits, they should be put to their Fines; adding also this ignominy, that such should be deprived of all Effaces and Honours for the space of Augulus care five years. And furthermore, he finely hindered the bad practice in Elections, giving order that for Election of none thould be out in nomination but furth as were verticals and of good recursion. La lation. none should be put in nomination but such as were vertuous and of good reputation. He less unto the Magistrates their charges whole, and did always require in all his Confulfitips that they should give him two Companions i howbeit the Senate would never agree unto it. The year before, he had reduced the number of Senatours to fix hundred, all honourable men. At that time also he rechtablished the ancient Order and Dignity: ordaining that the Senate should have the superintendency of the Treasure, and of all the revenues that belonged to the People of ROME. That all the expences for the Common-wealth should be made by their Ordinance. That the Senatours should have the hearing of all crimes of treason, conspiracy, ambushes, and offencer to his Majesties Perfon : and that it should pertain to them to give entertainment and answer that should be fit; to Ambaffadours of Nations. When in matters of importance he asked the advice of the Senate, inflead of coming to the Prince of the Senare according to the accustomed manner, or to him that was appointed Confull, or to other Senatours by order : he made clioice of any one of them which he thought good, to the end that every one should give attentive ear, and be ready to deliver his opinion: and not to hold his head down in his Rank, and content himfelf to be of other mens minds. He ordained also, that the whole body of the Senate should not aftemble but from fifteen days to fifteen days : howbeit that in ordinary matters the Magistrates should think of that that were expedient. In the Moneth of September and Officer , the Senatours were not bound to meet, but onely four hundred drawn by Lot: who might establish any Decree.

But the Ambaffadours of England prevented him, and promised Tribute. Then he went to Gaul in Augustus ma NARBONE, to draw nearer to SPAIN. And so holding on his journey to NARBONE, he keh Peace in pacified the Gauls, he made an exact numbering of all the Gauls, of their Goods, Possessiand distributions, and caused the Rolls to be brought unto him. He established Laws and Customs in evideth it in very place, and divided GAUL into four parts: of the which the first part was called NARBO-NENSE, which extendeth it felf from the River of Varunto the Mountains PIRENEI. Then Gaul Belgica, bottlered with the River of Rhine: and rated all the Gauls atten Milions of Gold for a Tax. Now there remained no more for him to do, but to bring SPAIN to order : in the which the ROMANS had made continual Wars the space of two hundred years together. Nevertheless the CANTABRIANS and ASTURIANS (which are the BASQUES) and other People neighbours dwelling in the Mountains, they neither cared for Augustus, nor for the Empire: for they were ever in arms, and made incursions upon the Allies of the People of ROME, and did them great mitchief : who complaining unto Augultus of the great necessity they were brought unto , he being near unto them, came to aid them : and found the CANTA BRIANS befreging of a Fort, having taken the Town by it called SAGESAME. He charged them home with fuch fury that he left them dead in the place, after they had valiantly defended themselves. Afterwards he divided his Army into three parts, and environed the Countrey of the CANTABRIANS, who made head for the space of five years, and did marvellous great hurt to the ROMANS; and if the straights whereby they might easily enter into their Country, had not been discovered umo Angustus, they had fent him home again to Rome with shame. But having found the way to furprize them on every fide, he made a cruell War upon them, putting all to fire and blood. They retired with speed to one of their highest Mountains, with all that they could carry with them. The ROMANS perceiving that it was too hard a match for them, if they should go thinher to fet upon so warlike a Nation, and that could not be subdued by force: they made Forts in the midft of the Mountain, and placed a strong Guard there, to the end to famish the CANTABRIANS, and Augustus maby that means to bring them to reason. But they on the other fide, instead of yeelding themselves, keth War with did abide all the miferies that any man can politibly think of: and it came to that pais; that even to the cantarrians did about an tite insertes that any inserted property of the mothers their Infants, and the young them to exmen did devour the old, eating up their Flesh. Upon this evill, there followed another, to wit, tream famine discord among them. Some would yeeld, others were of another mind. The tormer alledging, and misery. that they must needs submit themselves to the mercy of the ROMANS : the other, that they should make a desperate salley upon the Enemies Camp, and so sell their lives. Their contention waxed fo hot and violent, that the CANTA BRIANS thrust out ten thousand of the ASTURIANS with their Wives and Children, and compelled them to descend along the Forts made by the ROMANS; whom they intreated with the tears in their eyes to make them Slaves, and to give them somewhat to eat. Tiberius then one of Cafurs Lieutenants, would not suffer them to be received, to the end to famish the one by the other, and to end this War without any bloudshed. This Poor People being deprived of sustenance and hope, and being afraid they should yet endure greater evils, began to pownd a venimous Hearb like unto Smailage, and poyloned themselves, The young men killed themselves running one against another with their Swords in their hands, The others, to the number of three and twenty thousand, came down in a most miserable estate from the top of the Mountain, and yeelded themselves to the discretion of the ROMANS; who fet afide ten thousand of the strongest of them, to serve them in the War which they intended to make against the ASTURIANS. The rest were fold by Troops, with condition that they should be carried far from their Countrey , and that they should not be made free , before they had ferved them as Slaves, the space of thirty years. They difarmed ten thousand of them; which they bare so impatiently, that many killed themselves with their own hands, esteeming their life nothing without Arms. They fay, that a little Child with a Dagger killed his Father and Brethren that were chained together, and that by the commandment of the Father; and that a Woman did the like to some of her kinsfolks. And that many of these Mountainers accustomed to rob Passengers, being upon the gibbet fang out Songs aloud, even at their death, shewing a joy and marvellous courage. Augustus being then in those parts, gave leave to the Souldiers of his Guard of SPANIARDS to depart into the Territory of the GASCONS with great Prefents, and Priviledge to enter in rank amongst the ROMAN Legions. He built SARAGOUSSE, and other Towns, which he replenished with Souldiers , to bridle the courses and tumults of the CELTIBERIANS: and afterwards made a stone Bridge over the samous River of Eber. Then having overthrown the Co-Augustus war-NISCES, friends of the ASTURIANS, taken their head City, and put all the Inhabitants thereof sing against the to the Sword : he fet upon the Asturians, who being environed of all parts, and choosing rather Asturians, to die than to be made Slaves : burnt, killed, and poyfoned themselves, and with them many other of driveth them their neighbours. There were some of them yet left alive, with whom the CANTABRIAN'S joyned All goods and other their neighbours, and that a long time. These People had this custom, that all goods were common acommon amongst friends, and when one of them came to the other, he received and used him as him-mongst felf: and so also in adversity they ran one fortune, or else killed themselves immediatly after their friends, friends were dead. Among them were certain loose People gathered together out of divers parts, who resolved all together to go charge the ROMANS, and came to fight with such a fury, that nothing but the night could separate them, having lost many of both sides. The next morning they began to joyn again with more violence then before, and the fight continued even till night, that the ROMANS obtained the Victory : but they contessed, that they never encountered with such cruell Enemies. They that were left alive fled into a Town, in the defence whereof they made themselves all to be killed, rather then to yeeld themselves. August un built certain places there in that Countrey, which afterwards by time were much enlarged. In this felf-fame year of his ninth Confulfhip , Terentius Varro his Lieutenant subdued the SALASSIANS , which are those of the Vale of Ostre : he disarmed them , fold the young men by the drum , gave part of the Territory unto the Souldiers Pratorians, and built there a City called Augusta Pretoria. Vinicius alfo appealed some troubles in GERMANY, and made War very fortunatly in divers places. By means of which Victories, Augustu was called the eight time Imperator, as much to lay, as foveraign Captain: and they suffered him to wear from that time forth the first day of the year, a Hat of Lawrell, and a Robe of Triumph. At his return he shut the Temple of Janus the fourth time, married (Laghers (the Daughter of Artenius and Cleopatra) unto Juba the Story-writer, overthrown by Julius Cafar in Africk, with a part of MAURITANIA, and of GETULIA, to reign there. He reduced into a Province GALLOGRECIA and LYCAONIA, which made a Portion of a Kingdom: and by reason of his sickness nor able to be present at the marriage of his Daughter Julia. whom Marcellus married, the Son of Ottavia his Sifter, he left all to the charge of Agrippa, and went Augustus libeto ROME. There being chosen Consull the tenth time, the Senate gave him absolute power over the rality towards Estate and Laws, to make and undo them at his pleasure. They did him greater honoursthen before, and gave Marcellus his Nephew before his time great Offices in the Common wealth; and to Tiberius his Wives Son. He in token of thankfulness, gave to every one of the People ten Crowns apiece. Whilest these matters were in hand, the CANTABRIANS and their neighbours revolted, by fubrilry, caught fome of the ROMANS and cut their throats. Alins Limia, Governour in those parts, to be revenged of this outrage, put all the whole Countrey to fire and bloud, destroyed some Towns, and fold their young men by the drum. To be short, he followed them so hard, that he brought them in subjection. Alim Gallm Governor of EGYPT, almost about the same time being feat by Augustus commandment with ten thousand men, five hundred Souldiers of Herods Guard, and fifteen hundred NABATEIANS: under the Conduct of a Nobleman of ARABIA called Syllew: he did nothing to be accounted of, bur discover the Countrey. But having lost the most part of his men within the Defarts where this Syllem brought them, and overcome the SABEANS in a Battell, he was enforced to retire. Afterwards this Syllens, for that he killed his King Oboda by Treason, he was taken Prisoner, and beheaded by the Decree of the Senate. Angust when Being Confull for the eleventh time, the Plague was in Rome, and for himself he was grievoully fick, but restored again to health by Antonine Masa his Physician. The People therefore caufed a Statue to be fet up to this Antonism, the Senate did him great honours, and in favour of his Profession, gave immunity to all others that from that time forth did practice Physick, Fur-The People of thermore, by many Ceremonies they did shew the joy they had for the health of Augustus: and Roma are glad specially Fathers of housholds dying, expressely commanded their Children to bring their Sacrifices to the Capitoll with a Title in great Letters , faying : THAT AT THE DAY OF THEIR DEATH THEY LEFT AUGUSTUS IN GOOD HEALTH. It was also ordained that from that time forththey should never put any man to death, as often as Augustum entred into the City. Shortly after he did affociate with himself Calphunius Pifo in the Consulfhip, who had followed the party of Panney and of Brutus. Afterwards when he was gone from Roms into the Countrey, he made Lucim Cestim his Deputy for him, an inward friend of Brutm and of his memory. Whereat the Senate marvelling, by Decree made him perpetuall Pro-Confull of the ROMAN Empire, Tribune of the People, and gave him power to affemble the Senate as often, and when it pleafed him. The People would have compelled him to have been Dictator : but he bowing a knee, cafting down his long Robe, and shewing his breast, befought them to discharge him of so odious an estate. In the mean time he accepted the Decree of the Senate, and the charge to cause Corn to be brought in, because of the dearth that chanced in Rome. In the which he served his turn by Tiberom created QueRor at the age of nineteen years. As for Marcellon his Nephew, he was cholen & diliu Curulus, who aided him to fet forth all the magnificent pomp of plays, which he caused to be plaied before the People. Every man judged that he should be the Successour of all his power: but this young man of great hope, died shortly after, to the great grief of every man: and no man can tell whether it was of naturall fickness, or of poyson given him by the practites of

Livia. A littlebefore his death, Agrippa impatient to bear the rifing of this Marcellus whom he despited, went into Asia under colour of another Voyage. They say that Angustus much troubled with fickness, returned to his first consultation, to put the Common-wealth again into the hands of the Senate and People: and for this cause he called for the Senatours and all the other Magistrates:

unto whom he gave an account of the Empire: and that was a little Book containing the numbring of all the Riches, Towns, Provinces, Allies, Legions, Armies by Sea and by Land, of all the Kingdoms and Countriestributary, of all the Cultomes of the Empire of Rome, that which was necessarily to be leavied or released. But being somewhat amended again, he changed his mind.

And furthermore, having given Audience to the Ambassadours of Phracries King of the PARTHI-ANS, which demanded a Son of his brought by Tyridates unto Augustus, he sent back the Child, and fuffered Tyridates to remain at ROME, where he fumptuously entertained him. By this means be kept himself in friendship with the one and the other, and held the PARTHIANS in suspence, to the end they should alter nothing. At the beginning of the next year following, under the Confulfhip of Marcus Claudins Marcellus, and of L. Arumius, the Famine increasing at Rome, he wifely provided for it. And then the People would constrain him by force to accept the Dictatorflip, and threatned to fet the Palace on fire and to burn all the Senators in it, if they refused to allow this Decree. He would none of the Office of Dictatorship, and did resule also to be Censor, although that Office had been void the space of twenty eight years. But for as much as Monacius Planeus and Emylius Lepidus, who were chosen Cenfors, deferved themselves to be censured, because of their discords, Augustus without the Name took upon him to discharge it : and provided to Augustus re- reform infinite disorders that were in Rome, in Apparell, Countenances, Companies, and in the formeth many Fight of Fencers at the Sharp. At the same time Fannins Capio and L. Murana, having conspired against him, and being discovered by Castricius, were taken as they thought to have escaped, and put to death. In the mean time the ASTURIANS and CANTABRIANS ill intreated by Carifus, the rebelled, but were overcome in a fet Battell, and the prifoners fold, The CANTABRIANS preferring death before fervitude, killed, burnt, and poisoned the one the other. The ASTURIANS being overcome the fourth time, did submit themselves, and their Arms were taken from them. In the fame time, Petronius Governour of EGYPT, followed with ten thousand Footmen, and with eight hundred Horle, went to make War with the ETHIOPIANS, which dwell under ÆGYPT, who had invaded and ruined certain Towns, overthrown and carried away the Statues of Augustus. Thereupon he purfued them, and made them flie before him: took certain places upon them, and pierced far into their Countrey: so that he inforced their Queen to fend her Ambassadours unto Angustus (then wintering in the Ille of Samos) to pray Peace, which he granted them paying

At the beginning of the Spring, he prepared himfelf to give order for the Affairs in the Eslt: but because they that bent themselves for the Consulfnip land almost put the City in Alarm, and that in the end, notwithstanding the Order he had set down, the People had chosen men whom Augustias feared : through the advice of Macena, he made Agrippa come again to govern ROME in his abfence, and married unto him his Daughter Julia, Marcellus Widow, Now whilest Agrippa gave orders for the Affairs of the City, Augustus took Sea, and having provided for the Affairs of SI. Augustus fail-CILIA, he went into GREECE, did much good for the LACEDEMONIANS, and to the contrary reprefied the pride of the ATHENIANS, from whom he took away the Tribute they had, and what he work and the soft most price of the ATHENIANS of the meantings theoreby have did the they had. leavied of the Isles ÆGINA and ERETRIA. In the mean time, though he made little account of did there, strangers ceremonies, yet he made himself to be received into the Fraternity of Mysteries : and the Ambaffadours of Persia having caused the Temple of Ingiter Olympian to be finished, begun of long time in ATHENS, they ordained that it should be dedicated to the Spirit of Augustus. Being passed from thence into Asia, he gave order to his Provinces and those of the People of ROME punished the CYZICENIANS, that had killed the ROMAN Citizens in their Town, He imposed a Tribute upon those of Tyre and Sidon, who had dealt badly, and brought them into the form of a Province. He did much good unto the Towns that had been faithfull unto the Common-wealth ! to some of them he gave the right of Burgesship of ROME, and to others the same rights and Priviledges which the naturall Citizens of Rome had. He built up again the Cities of LAODICEA, and of THIATIRA : he fet them up of the Ille of CHIO again, afflicted before by an Earth-quake : he did exempt them from all Subfidies for fix years. He reftored certain Realms unto their Kings whom he had subdued : or else he did establish others anew, who came to attend him at his Court as Subjects, without any figns or tokens of Royall Dignity. He fent Tiberius into Armenia, to install Tieranes unto his Royall Throne again, having been driven out of it. Tibirius returned thither, and having fought with the ARMENIANS, he gave them Artavafdes to their King, who ruled not long. Phraartes King of the PARTHIANS being afraid they would fet upon him; was very carefull to get all the ROMANS together, which were taken after the overthrow of Craffus and Antonius; whom he sent every man of them unto Augustus, with all the Standards and Ensignes. and also his Son and Nephews for Pledges of his faithfull triendship unto the People of ROME. Auguffus granted him Peace, and then he came into the Isle of SAMOS, comforted RHODES, replenished CORINTH and PATRAS with a great number of men enfranchifed, whom he made Burgeffes of Rome. In this place also there came unto him Ambassadours from Porus and Pandion two of the mightieft Kings of the INDIA NS, who prayed alliance and friendship with him, and brought him very rare Presents. There came with them a Philosopher of India called Zarmanus; who being brought to the City of ATHENS; burnt himself alive, as one Calamus did in the time of Alexander

In this mean space the City of ROME was full of great trouble by the practises of Equations Rufus, Rome full of In this mean space the City of ROME was full of great troubles by the practice of Legislation Anymos, troubles in who by force would needs be chosen Confull in Angulus place being ablem: who gave not him his Angulus about the chosen and angulus and angulus and angulus and angulus angulus and angulus angu voice, but named Lucretius Vespillo, escaped from the Proscription, as hath been spoken of before, fence, But this put him in fuch a rage, that he conspired with M. Genucius, and Plantius Rufus to kill Anguffus. But they being discovered betimes, were imprisoned and executed by decree of the Senate : who made infinite numbers of honours unto Augustus at his return : howbeit he would not accept them all, but carried himself very modeftly in every place where he was. The People chose him Censor for five years , and perpetual Confull ; and at his request they gramed Triumph unto Cornelius Balbus, although he were no ROMAN born (for he was a SPANIARD) by reason of his notable Victories he had obtained as Lieurenant of Augustus, upon the GARAMANTES. Agrippa on the other fide was fent into GAUL troubled by the invafions of the GERMANS, whom he ordered Agripps is well enough. Then he led his Army into Spain, troubled with the rebellion of the Canta-fent to appeade BRIANS : the which came thus to pals. The Prisoners CANTABRIANS whom they had fold by troubles the drum, by a complot they made together, cut their Masters Throats, and then fled into their France and Countrey, where they follicited others to take arms, got their fortreffes into their hands, and fet upon the ROMAN Garrifons. Agreppa could by no means bring his Souldiers thither, whether that they defired to take reft, or that the resolution of the CANTABRIANS did aftonish them. But after that he had brought them to his hand, he marched directly against the Enemies: who had the better at the first encounter, and the ROMANS were well beaten. But they being rebuked and punished by Agrippa, who gave them Barley for Wheat, he returned again to fight. But then the CANTABRIANS that bare arms were all cut in pieces, the rest disarmed, and drawn from the Mounrain to dwell in the Plain. Angustus was faluted Emperour or foveraign Captain, because of this Victory: but Agrippa modeftly refused Triumph, and within a while after he overcame the PAN NO-MIANS alfo. The year following, the GETES and DACES being at civill Wars, Lemalus that had Subdued them before, counselled Augustus not to lose this occasion: for he might easily subdue these barbarous People being thus divided. But Angustus not being of the mind to make any Wars at all Angustus would not would not with any Nation, without great and just cause, (although there were more hope of gam, then appeadingly make War renee of lofs. The answered: There was no cause for him to do so: adding also, that those that without great fought a little gain with great lofs and danger, were like unto those that would angle with a golden and just cause: Hook; the which breaking and falling into the water, no Fift is worth the value of it. And therefore that the barbarous People were to be left to their own mileries: and that by their bloud-fied, by their own Companions, they were more then enough punished for the ills they had done to the ROMANS, who ought not to begin first to do evill. In the same year Augustus being very defirous to put his hand to the reformation of abuses

Suits for publick Offices. He fer Fines upon their heads that would not marry, and beflowed much upon them that had Wivesand Children. He gave unto Hortenfius Hortalius five and twenty thou-fand Crowns, to procure him to take a Wife, that he might raife up iffue to that Noble house and Family of the Hortenfes. He ordained also that Maidens should be twelve years old at the least before they married, and fuffered them to kill Adulterers taken in the fact without punishment, condemning the Sodomites without remiffion. And for Military Discipline, he looked very carefully unto that. And because a Knight of Rome had cut off his own Sons thombs, for that he thould not go to the War, he made him to be fold by the drum, and all his goods. But becaule the Regrators were greedy to feize upon them, he made them ceafe the fale, and put the

Knight into the hands of one of his bondmen enfranchifed, and was contented to drive him our

of ROME. Furthermore he procured that the Senate should not be kept but with great Reverence:

that the Senatours should come together as into a Temple of Devotion, and that no Decree should país, but in the presence of sour hundred Senatours, it it might be : that no man should be made free of Rome, but upon great consideration. For the rest, he and Agrippa gave the People the pleasure of secular yearly Games, which had not been seen an hundred years before. But he took very great care that there should be no infolencies committed. He punished the Players in divers forts, that behaved themselves more licentiously then became them. And when one of them amongst them called him Lord, he shewed the People with his voice, his eyes, and his hand, that he was not well pleafed withall: and the next morning he published a sharp Edict, forbidding all

Perfons expresly to fay to, and would never fuffer that any of his should give him this Name. But thefe Plaiesbeing ended, he adopted Caus and Lucius the Sons of Agrippa. In all this great bufi-

nes, the SICAMBRES, USIPITES, and TENCHTERES, People of GERMANIE, Surprised

GAUL, and took away an Enfign from him. Yet though he were a man of fmall action, and very coverous: nevertheless he was revenged of them, and coming upon the invadors, fought with them, and drave them beyond the Rhine. On the other fide, C. Lennium made War with the DAGES, and killed three of their chief Leaders with a great number of men: and afterwards he established a Garrison by the River of Danuby, to stop the incursions of this wild Nation. Angufim feeing these troubles, disposed of the Affairs of ITALY to go into GAUL, to rid himselt of thele griefs, and by his ablence to make his prefence more honourable. At that fame time, divers People inhabiting upon the River of Danuby, rebelled ; but Augustus Lieutenants bestirred them so well, that they were all compelled to feek Peace. At that time also all Gaul was in commotion, and found the means to escape well enough. For after he had gotten an infinite Mass of Gold and Silver together, he brought it to Augustus, faying he had never other intention but to take from the Gauls the means to rebell. For all this Augustus withdrew him from therce, and sent Ti-beriss thither to fettle all things in good estate again. Almost during these commotions, and outragious diffentions, the RHETIANS, near unto the Lake of Come, brake into GAUL CI-

SALPINE, and took out of ITALY flore of booty. They were a People separated from all others, and so cruell, that having taken any place from the ROMANS, they killed all the Male Children, and further, did ask their Soothlayers of Women with child : and if they faid the was great their little Children by their Leggs, and did most barbarously force themselves to smite their Enemies in the face. Those that were driven out of ITALY would have entred into GAUL, but they were repulfed by Tiberim. In the end , thefe People and their Allies were conftrained to fub-

Augustus re- Cenfor, and did establish him Tribune for five years. First of all he began to correct some difformeth abuses orders that were in the Senate, he reformed the Knights, Spectacles, and Plaies, and the manner of and diforders in Rome.

Augustus sent a Colony unto NISMES in LANGUEDOCK : and made them free Burgesses of ROME. It is thought that he fent another unto ARLES, of the fixth Legion : and one of the fecond unto ORANGE. So make report of these Colonies in the time of Tiberius. M. Agrippa on the other fide, he gave order for the Affairs of Asia, and of all the Orient, where he behaved himfelf fo well, that all that were friends to the People of Roun, were of better courage then before, and all their Enemies to valiantly suppressed, that Augustu was saluted the tenth time soveraign Captain. But Agripps after his wonted manner, would have no Triumph; which was the cause of the lofs of this cuftome, and others following his example, were contented from thenceforth with the Ornaments of Triumph. But of another fide, the PANNONIANS, the GENOUESES, and those of PIEMONT rebelling, they were fubdued by the Lieutenants of Augustue; who builded two Cities in teftimony of his Victory against these two last People : whereof Turin (called Angulfa Pretoria) was one, and GENBA the other.

AUGUSTUS.

Ansastan having pacified GAUL, stayed the invasions of the GERMANS, and quenched the rebellion of SPAIN : he left Drufus with authority and his Army upon the Rhine, and the recention of States and out of Asia, and became extreamly fick of the Gout. Lepidus Augustustedied at the same time, to whom Angustus increeded in the estate of this Bishop, and made turning to sumptious Speciacles and sights unto the People. He built all the Books of Divination and Pro-Rome, successive the built all the Books of Divination and Pro-Rome, successive the built all the Books of Divination and Pro-Rome, successive the built all the Books of Divination and Pro-Rome, successive the built all the Books of Divination and Pro-Rome, successive the built all the Books of Divination and Pro-Rome, successive the built all the Books of Divination and Pro-Rome, successive the built all the Books of Divination and Pro-Rome, successive the built all the Books of Divination and Pro-Rome, successive the built all the Books of Divination and Pro-Rome, successive the built all the Books of Divination and Pro-Rome, successive the built all the Books of Divination and Pro-Rome, successive the built all the Books of Divination and Pro-Rome, successive the built all the Books of Divination and Pro-Rome, successive the built all the Books of Divination and Pro-Rome, successive the built all the Books of Divination and Pro-Rome, successive the built all the Books of Divination and Pro-Rome, successive the Books of Divination and Pro-Rome, succe phecy, except those of the Sitylles : and yet he kept them not all. He reformed the Kalender, and the citize of ordained that there should be no Leap years for twelve years following. He suffered that the chief Press. fixth Moneth then called Sexilla, should be called Angustus after his Name. All that year was foent in Plays and Pastimes, saving that Angustus (having been sick) caused all that he had done in his Government to be rehearled before the Senate, He took a review of the Senatours, and in his Government, to be retreat a coordinated by the first of a Tribune for five years more. But shortly after, Agrippa, Anthis great person being returned from a Journey out of PANNONIA, whither he was gone to pre-gular his Newent disorders that were likely to be renewed, he fell lick and died, before Angasam could come phew dieth, vent uniquers that was a marriellous grief unto him: and not knowing now on whom he should be, and full in time. That was a marriellous grief unto him: and not knowing now on whom he should be, and full in the end he chose Tiberine his Wives Son. and married them require. Widow is mirror. from his Daughter India, in the end he chofe Tiberini his Wives Son, and married them together, ited to Tiberitow ins Danguet 1 min, in the state of the s whom we shall speak to best purpose in the Life of Tiberim, yet we will briefly note it here. So then Tiberius went and made War in PANNONIA, rifen by means of the death of Agrippa; yet he made an end of it, killed some of them, fold and subjected the rest: and compelled all that People to submit themselves unto the People of ROME. Drusus on the other side made War in High and Low Almain, and brought the most part of these Nations unto some reason : and afterwards he returned to ROME: where Augustus held so straight a hand to bring the Senate to order, that there were few men desired to be of the Senate, and many to the contrary that gave up their Offices. But Angustus compelled those that were of age, of quality and sufficiency, and gave order also that the Dignity of the Tribunes of the People should remain entire : suffering those notwithstanding which had this Office, their time expired, to be amongst the Senatours, or with Knights. As for the Towns of Asia afflicted with the Earth-quake, he payed of his own to the Common-wealth, the yearly Tribute which they ought. And for the regard of those which were of his Provinces, he freed them from all Imposts for his years, and gave them of PALESTINE a great quantity of Corn, which fultained great want and famine. In the mean time Drafau Drafau overpalled over the Rhine, made War with the USIPITES, SICAMBRIANS, TENCHTERES, cometi the CATTIANS, CHERUSIANS, and SUAUBIANS, whom he overthrew in divers encounters: confident preand effectably in a great Battell, were where killed a very great number. For these People were ga-fumptions thered together with such a considence of Victory, that they had already made agreement a Rebels.

mong themselves for division of the booty. But especially at the last Battell, the CHERUSIANS. should have the Horse, the SUAUBIANS they should have the baggage, and the SICAMBRIANS the Prisoners. And yet to bind themselves more straightly together, they burnt twenty Centeners of the ROMANS. And this was the cause that the Battell was so long and cruelly fought betwixt them: yet in the end the Victory remained to Drufus, who gave the Prisoners and all the booty to the Souldiers, making the Horfe, Baggage, and captives to be fold to them that would offer most. All the Field for a great league and a half of length was strewed with dead bodies, and they found in the Enemies Camp great store of Iron Chains prepared by them for the ROMANS: howbeit they served for them. Drussu set up a token of Triumph, and was called Imperator of his Troops in the Field where the Battell was pitched. Afterwards he built above fifty Castles upon the Rivers of Menfe, Vifurge , and of the Rhine. Tiberius on the other fide was in DALMATIA. where he brought them under that role in arms against them. The Triumph of Ovatio was decreed to them both, and Augustus was faluted by the Senate Imperator or foveraign Captain, and this for the twelfth time. But in these businesses , the War was hot in THRACIA, and more then ever before : all the Provinces being in rebellion under the Conduct of Bulog afes, who had killed the King Rhacuspolis, an Ally of the People of ROME, driven out his Uncle and Lieutenant Rhymetalces out of THRACIA into CHERONNESUS. L. Pifo Governour of PAMPHILIA Went against them, and at the first encounter had not the advantage, but in the second he overcame them unterly. Drusus having made a Voyage to Rome, to celebrate the birth day of Augustus in great magnificence, whilest his Troops reposed themselves in their Garisons, about the Spring he returned into Germany, overcame the Suaubians, gave them a King: then he invaded the Countrey of the Marcomannes, fought with them diverstimes, killed a great number of them, and made all the reft subject to the ROMANS. Because of this Victory, and of that of Pife, Augustus was called Imperator the thirteenth time. Almost in this time he put Proculus to death in prilon, one that he loved best of all his bondmen made free: being convinced of many Adulteries. He made the Proculus on thighs of his Secretary Thalks to be broken, for the fum of an hundred Crowns which he took for Adulterer put to death by Thewing a fecret Letter. Nonius Afprenas, one of his greatest friends, was accused by Cassius Severus to have poyloned an hundred and thirry bidden Guefts at a Banquet. August w did not recommend him, but letthe Senatours alone, who banished Cassiu. An old Souldier upon complaint being brought before the Senatours, and in danger of his life, befought Augustus to help him. This pleased Augustus greatly, though he fained to take no pleasure in it. Furthermore, he then made an Edict touching slanderous libels, declaring who should have the hearing of those crimes, and how they should be punished: although he himself cared not much, and patiently suffered they should gibe at him, contented to answer by open defence, unto the reproaches and mockeries they made of him. They feattered abroad one day in the Palace many bils of Paper of cruell injuries against him. This moved him not at all, neither did he trouble himfelf much to answer it : but instead of fearthing it out, he did advise that hereafter they should have an eye upon those, that by little Booksor Epigrams published (under false Names) scandall against any man. Tiberius wrote a round Letter to him one day to the end he should carry a straighter hand upon that : but he sent him these words, 1 pray thee my friend, 1et not thy youth over-rule thee in this matter, nor be not fo hot, though I be evill spoken of by some. It is enough if we gain this point, that no man can hurt us. In the mean time Augustus provided for the Affairs of ISTRIA, divided ITALY into eleven Provinces: and because he doubted they did envy his greaness, he chose nine Pratorian Cohorts for his Guard, of the which he kept three of them in ROME, lodged here and there in houses, so long as they were in their quarter: and the fix others were quartered in the next villages unto it. He also erected new Offices, to impart to fo many men more the honours and charges of the Common-wealth. At the fame time when before the Senate they did object many crimes unto Amilius Alianus, and amongst other Augustus his things that he spake ill of Augustus: he returning to the accuser, said unto him as in choler: patience for-Prove me that, and I will make Elianus know that I have a tongue : for I will fay more of him, then bearing of ill he hath spoken of me. From his eleventh Confulship unto the twelfth, there passed seventeen years: all which time he divers times had refuled his charge: but now he demanded it, and obtained it. His intention was to advance Caius his little Son to great Dignity, whom he caused to be proclaimed, young Prince, and senthim to fee the Provinces and Armies, in the Title of a Pro-confull. Then he commanded him to go into ASIA, having given him for Governours Lollius and Sulpitius Quirinus. He himself in the mean time remained at ROME, where he established extraordinary Guards, under colour to keep Theeves and masterless men from offering violence, whilest the Armies abroad were far off. The year following, Caim having travelled in divers parts of the Orient, made peace with Phraates King of the PARTHIANS, and brought away hoftages for affurance thereof, the Kings three Brethren, and all the Princes of the bloud. The which was practifed by the means of the Queen Termufa, born in ITALY, who being fent by Augustus for a Gift unto Phraates, he fell so in love with her, and held her in such high estimation, that after she had brought him a Son called Phrastaces, he received her for his lawfull Wife. And when Corn came again to the ordinary price, he was about to abolifh the distribution of Corn which the Common-wealth made : breaufe that the People trufting unto that , made no reckning to plow their Land. At the fame time many Towns in divers Provinces were inclined to rebell, which caused the Senate to make a Decree, that the Governours of Provinces should command two years one after another, and should not depart thence till their Successour were arrived. The II-LYRIANS also began to rise, but they were supprest immediately by Valerius Messalians. For Divers rebelliGERMANY, all were subject under the name of the ROMANS, except the MARCOMANNES, and their King Marobahus; a valiant and wiseman, that kept himself and his People in good Disconsistance. pline, having always an Army ready of threefcore and ten thouland Footmen, and four thouland Horse, all the which he trained and put in readiness against his neighbours, to defend him the better against the ROMANS, if they came to assail him. Tiberius prepared himself with twelve Legons to make War with him, but being conftrained to go against the ILLYRIANS, he made a greement with Marobaduss, that fought peace and quietness, and so marched where necessity called him. For the ILLYRIANS, to the number of eight hundred thousand men and upwards, role in manner all at an inftant ; and muftered up in short time , with such order in their affairs and Warlike exploits, that they possest and brought in subjection almost all MACEDON, and put Angussius into a marvellous perplexity, because they prepared themselves to come into ITA-LIE. Hereupon Tiberius is chosen to go against them, the which he did with so good direction and Warlike judgement, that he dispersed their Army. But now concerning the Countrey of THRACIA, there the Army of the ROMANS was put to flight : yet taking heart again, they returned to meet with their Enemies, and obtained an honourable Victory. For which canfe they called Augustus Imperatour or foversign Capsain the fixteenth time. The ILLYRIANS made head again better then before under the conduct of Bato Defidiates, they made violent and strange invasions, and Tiberius never came against them. Whereupon Augustus conceiving an evil opinion, difpatched Germanicus the fon of Drufus, to go into ILLYRIA with a compleat Army. On the other fide Agrippa Posthumus shewed himself so insolent, and committed so many follies, that Augustus could no longer endure them, and therefore he difavowed and difinherited him, confifcated his goods. Agrippa Poltand confined him to Surrentum: where being more audacious then before, he banished him into bumus for his the Ille of Planasia, near unto Corsica: and caufed the Senate to make an ordinance that he follies and inshould remain there till his death. By this means every man began to regard Tiberius, who was also nished. declared the son and colleague of Augustus by decree of the Senate, who committed unto him all the Armies and Provinces of the Empire. Livia his mother did help him greatly in all these affairs. Furthermore he would not fir out of ILLYRIA untill he had made an end of this War, which continued three whole years.

Now at the arrival of Germanicus, the Chieftains of the ILLYRIANS came fuddenly to affail the Camp of the ROMANS: who faining to be afraid, staid till the enemy came to charge them in dif-

By reason Dalmatians. whereof they gave Augustus the name of Imperator the eighteenth time. Bato Desidiates came to falute Tiberius fet in his tribunal chair, without holding down his head, or any imbasing himself: and being asked why after fo many battles loft, he did yet rebel again? he answered boldly again, that the ROMANS were the cause of it: who instead of Shepherds had sent them Wolves to keep their Oppressors Flock. Peace was granted unto the DALMATIANS upon certain conditions. And as for the BREU-caulers of re-CIANS which continued their War, they were overthrown in many encounters, and at the length brought to subjection by Plantins Silvanus, who triumphed. Their King Bato Benerus had betrayed and delivered unto the ROMANS another great Captain of the ILLYRIANS called Pinnetes: and afterwards he was delivered himself by his own men unto Bato Desidiates, who killed him with his own hand : and then fortified himself in DALMATIA, where having made head almost a year and an half against the Armies of Tiberius and Germanicus, he won and lost-many battles: at the last, being able to hold out no longer, he fent his fon to demand peace of Tiberius, promifing to yield himfelf and his into the hands of Augustus. He obtained fafe conduct, and came by night unto Tiberius Camp: who gave him very gracious entertainment, and many rich presents. Afterwards he made him be brought to RAVENNA, and was also gently used, because that in an encounter where he was inclosed, and in danger of his life, he had given him means to escape and fave himself. And because of the divers victories obtained by Germanicus and Tiberius, Angustus was faluted for the nineteenthand twentieth time Imperator or foveraign Captain. And for the PANNONIANS, their young men that had so many times threatened IT ALY, were constrained to bring all their Arms together on a heap, as they were commanded, and to fall on their knees before Tiberius to demand peace of him. He received them into grace, and fent them home to their houses, disposing his Garisons in strong places. under the charge of Marcus Lepidus. The glory of Tiberius was yet more noble, and the anguilhes

Prince of the CHERUSSIANS, was inclosed in Marshes, and utterly overthrown with three Ro- rusoverthrown MAN Legions that were flain in the place : and for himself, fearing to fall alive into the hands of the CHERUSSIANS, he killed himself with his own hand. The victors did never so cruelly handle the ROMANS as those whom they might know were common counsellers and pleaders. For at the beginning when Farus came to command their Countrey, where they knew not what process meant, he perswaded himself he should tame them well enough, using the same form and order of process there amongst them, as they did at ROME. So he had a judgement seat, and all matters were pleaded before him. Some of them amongst the rest very subtil, seemed to esteem much of this pleading; and to bring him alleep, they of purpose moved occasion of processand suit one against the other: and then they went before him, and by the ROMANS themselves whose tongues they borrowed, they demand- The Roman ed justice. Touching Augustus, he qualified some strick Laws against the unmarried, the gifts of husband to the wife, the banquets and fuits: he did forbid the Divines to answer the vain question of those, that would know how long they should live: and he suffered the Knights (if they were challenged) to fight at the sharp. Germanicus being returned to Rome, obtained the Confulfhip, and Tiberism triumphed of the Illyrians, Pannonians, Dalmati-ANS, and GERMANS: followed with his Lieutenant Germanicus, Vibius Posthumus, Plantius Silvanu, and Marcus Lepidus, with triumphing robes. But before he went up to the Capitol, he went out of his Charret, and fell down on his knees before Augustu. Then he made a dinner for all the people, and had a thouland tables fet up for them, and gave to every one of them feven crowns and a half. Under the Consulship of C. Which they having well confidered, found no better means then that which he himself had found out, to wit, of the twentieth part of the inheritances: and they all agreed unto it. The next year following, he went (as they fay) to fee Agrippa in his Isle of PLA-NASIA, the which troubled Livia much for the knew what was past. At the same time he and Tibe. rius took muster of the Roman Citizens, and shortly after he fell sick, whereof they recite many caufes. THE LIFE OF LUTARCH.

Ann. Mund. 4053.

Post. Christ

Thy precepts are a Crown of purest gold To Trajan deem'd the glory of mankind. In hands, and hearts, if great men would thee hold, Vertue should rule, and Vice should go behind.

Aving undertaken to gather the Lives of Plutarch, and of Seneca, as they themselves are amply shewed in their Works, the which in despite of the sury of an infinite of strange accidents have yet remained whole and in reputation untill this present time : First, this thought hath possessed me before, that some men marvel, how, and wherefore I do joyn Philosophers, quiet men, and friends of folitariness, unto so many Noble and Worthy Warriors. Wherein it seemeth I wander too far off from the principal intention of Plutarch, who was fo willing to honour the Muses, joyning into one body so many members and parts of Histories offered unto the posterity, that in the mean time he hath accompanied, and as it were environ-

With Darts, and Targets of Mars redoubtable. But I hope, that if those (which think strange of my doings) will but at leisure, with a reposed eye, look upon the Lives before i they shall find that I have not gone so far from the right meaning, as at the first fight may be judged. For, besides that the Lives of some Orators, especially of Demosthenes and of Cicero, are feen amongst the others: you shall find few Noblemen represented by our The reason Author, but that they have as carefully handled books, as their fwords. And if fome feem to be why the Lives fo much given to Arms, that they have left the study of learning behind them, yet we may see that of Philosophers they have loved Philosophers, and that they themselves have earnestly and effectually reasoned of are joyn Philosophy, in time of War and Peace. And whereas Plutarch hath mingled some with vertuous with the Lives men, fome (I say) which have done infinite hurt to themselves, and to all the world during their Why Physical Lives, and whose names are detested at this day by those themselves which follow their execrable doings: his intention was not to place them in the Theatre of Vertue, as if they had deferved it : of fome vicious but as Learned Painters finely apply cloudy and dark colours in their tables, to the end that the lively men amongst and fresh colours should appear more beautifull, and as it were imbossed; so in intermingling the the vertuous. strange excesses of some GREEKS and ROMANS amongst so worthy Acts of others, he hath so firly mingled the sweet and profitable together, that it is not possible to be better. But if my two Philosophers (fince I have begun to qualifie them thus) were contented to shut up themfelves in some School or Study, and to do nothing else but declaim and fashion some Scholars,

it may be indeed I should better have lest this enterprise unto some follower of Diogenes Lacrism, that would describe the Sects of Philosophy, and the principal founders of the same. Now there are here two personages, which (as the soul within the body) have through their notable counsels given motions unto great and mean men in their time, and by other mens eyes and hands have done infinite things in the lociety of mans life, unto the which they ferve at this day with their precepts and goodly inftructions, without the which the exploits of others should be partly buried and abolifred, as those have been of so many other men that came before and after. They be the two Schoolmasters and Counsellors of two Emperors. They be men that beside their study have born great and honourable Offices, in the which they have fo carried themselves, that by their actions a man may gather, that knowledge is a great prop and flay to a vertuous man. If they have not worn Armour and commanded Armies: if a man fee them in a long Gown, and their Books in their Armour and commanded armors in a man rectuent at a rong Gown, and their books in their hands, they lofe not thereby their glory, which fo many ways recommendeth them at this pretent, having lift up learning in honour, and furnished strong Arms, by means whereof all Princes may wifely and happily maintain their estates against the sury of Wars, and under the quiet governwhen y and happy mannant that the contrary, when wedence alone would rule, and that men thought there ment of Peace. As to the contrary, when wedence alone would rule, and that men thought there was no need that our spirits (hould be kept in and directed by the exhortations of Philosophy, con-Mif. hiefs that was no need that our spirits included and overdrew that which they thought had been furel fer nunous came on mineaps, which it is to represent the ground. They themselves could have done that, and ction by Phiin their writings there are draughts very agreeable to their gravity. But as we do not willingly take the Penfill to paint our felves, but to pleafe our felves, the discourse of our thought sufficesh. In like manner also these goodly spirits, being contented to be known by the glass of their vertue which followeth them, they leave every body to think of their deeds and words that which is meer, Amongst all the Books that ferve for the use of mans life next unto that which concerneth the Soversign good we hope for in a better place then this world, I think there are none more profit-

Notwithstanding as Plutareh doth ordinarily place the GREEKS before the ROMANS, and that for the matter of their Lives there is no need otherwise for a man to trouble himself much about the disposing of them, and that those which be dead do not quarrel together to know who shall go before or behind, I have thought with my self, that I might begin this work where I thought good, without binding my self too curiously, either to the order of time, or to such other circumstances. For if any man be offended, I will alledge that unto him which was spoken unto one displeased because his horse was painted standing on his feet, which he would have had lying on his back and his feet upward: Turn the other fide upward, and you shall be pleased. Even so is it in his choice to read such a Life sirth as he thinketh good, and to turn the table at his pleafure, no man being conftrained to come into the closet of the Muses, but at his own will, and by the gate which pleafeth him best. I could have been contented to have offered Plutarch onely, or left him hidden in his works, the true and durable treasures of his glory: but having been follicited to shew some patterns, I was unwilling to let him go alone. Now, I cannot cast mine eye upon that personage, but Seneca dothalso present himself unto me, for many reports and agreements that are between them. For, befides that nature hath brought them into the world in the revolution of one Age, both came out of a strange Countrey to ROME ; both of them were rich and of great power, Mafters and teachers of two Emperours, which did enrich and advance them to honour, and great Offices of the Commonwealth. In regard of their Learning, although the one of them was of a Sect impugned by the other in divers respects, yet they both tended to one end, although it was by divers ways, to wit, to drive away vice and vanity out of the hearts of their disciples, and to plant in them the love of Vertue, the contempt of Death, and of the world, with fo found reasons, and so well combined the one to the other, that it is unpolfible to enter into a School of the Heathen better ordered then that of these two, to learn (as we ought) to be ashamed of dishonest things, and to exercise those that be honest and vertious. But as touching other agreements and diffemblances which may be noted as well in their fife and behaviour as in their doctrine, peradventure it shall be better to referve it to fitter place, or to leave the Discourse unto the studious Readers, who advisedly considering this little which we presently prefent unto them, and joyning thereto the writings of the one and the other, shall know what Authority and Art these two wise men have to draw the most ignorant and foolish to the love of Vertue. Also that their stile, with their pertinent and plain manner of discourse, is accompanied with great gravity and forcible reasons, to make men confident to believe them. If the one flow fweetly, and almost always maintaineth himself in the same; the other in his wanderings and rollings Phatach and ahout can well reform his errors, and come to it again in time, and then go on better then when he first Sences combegan. Plutarch useth a world of reproaches and hooks to pull down vice. Seneca feemeth to pro. red ti gethe. voke him to the combat, and when he fetteth upon him, it is by taking him by the choller and shaking him in all parts. The one feemeth to be a company of light horfemen charging very fwiftly, and at divers wheelings and returns: the other, to a battallion of footmen well fer in order, affailing resolutely, and not removing out of the place before he hath won the victory. The opinions of Plutarch are handled with Platonical inftructions, enriched with examples, with fimilitudes, with quick fentences, and gracious recitals, which force the reader to yield. Seneca drawing that which is praife worthy from the STOICKS, and from EPICURUS also goodly instructions, as the Bee finely draweth from the herb of bitter juyce that which maketh sweet honey, differing somewhat from the common use, he maketha very profitable and fure harbour wherein a heart ill fetled may repose it felf. The one speaketh as a friend, the other as a mafter : and both with fuch a grace, that whether they give good counfell, or that they command, the ears and hearts do bow at their voices. Infomuch that the wicked are constrained in reading of these Philosophers to acknowledge, and plainly to hear within this grave School; The forcible a million of truths which condemneth them: and I cannot tell with what hidden force: dist Adminating draweth iron) they feel themselves to be carried that way; unto the which the learned instructions of virtous and the truth with the learned instructions of virtous men. these two Philosophers do direct them, to delight in them even with mourning, and to confess, that thele be the persons of whom men may learn to be less vicious, and more vertuous, Good men also they gather there as sweet fruit as possible may be, for remedy against so many cruelties of this prefent life. And although they find their true and perfect contentment in a far better School without comparison, yet so it is, that in this School here they understand things which afterwards makes the other more acceptable and more honourable. Now for as much as afterwards we have mixed the memories of their lives with divers particularities, which will make us fee a part of the comparisons that may be noted between them, let us begin with Plutarch, and confider his Life principally by the inftructions which he himfelf hath left, and namely in many places of his Morall and mingled

Paulanias, in the ninth Book of his Description of GREECE, faith, that there ran a common rumor abroad among the THEBANS, that Cadmus the fon of Agenor coming from DELPHOS into PHOCIDE, was guided by a Cow marked in both her flanks with white spots in form of a full Moon: and that the Oracle commanded him to ftay with his Troops in that place where the Cow should lie down. Which came to pass in the territory afterwards called BOEOTIA, because of this Cow. At the beginning of the same book he saith, that BOEOTIA took the same name of Become the son of Iton, and of the Nymph Menalippe : which should feem repugnant. But the one and the other opinion may well agree, if we fay that Cadmus being come into that part of the Countrey, Bastin that had a charge in these Troops, and remaining there after the others, left his name to all the territory which is near neighbour to ATTICA, but in a thicker air because it standeth betwixt two mountains, and that the Countrey is more Northwards. So that the ATHENIANS were ever thinner in body, and of livelier spirit; and the BOEOTIANS to the contrary, fuller of flesh, and duller of wir also. From whence came many flents of laughter against the masse and weight of their understandings, and they made Proverbs dispersed in Greek and Latin Books. Yea the Poets themselves, and Ebulin among others, do flout the BOEOTIANS, that they are great feeders, and love to fpeak much: which agreeth very well with the rest of their manners. Plutarch also himself in his first treaty of eating of flesh, noteth somewhat of that. Nevertheless, of such a Countrey came Pelopidas, and other excellent men, but namely him of whom we are now prefently to speak of, no simple nor fottish man; but as

Midft bushes, and the thickest of the thorn The flowers of tendrest violet are born:

Even so out of a Countrey accustomed to bring forth fat men, as they say, and fitter for War then learning, came Plutarch, born in the City of CHERONEA, near unto LEBADIA. In old time (as Plutarch came Paufanias faith) it was called AR NE, because of Arne the daughter of Aolus. But afterwards because out of Charonca it stood evil, and looked towards the West, Charon the son of Apollo, and of There the daughter of oils. Phylas, caused it to be new built, and turned to the East, to make it more wholsome and habitable. Upon which occasion, in token of thankfulness for the good act of the founder, it was ever after called CHERONEA. And although for many memorable accidents this Town is noted in Histories, yet do I not know any thing that hath fo much kept up the memory of it untill this prefent, as the name of Plutarch, whose ancestors, men of a noble race, maintained themselves from father to the son Plutarchs dein honourable office and place of charge in their little Commonwealth, untill the time of Nicar- fcent, and educhus his great Grandfather, who lived in the time of Angustus Cafar, as Plutarch reporteth in cation. the Life of Antonius; where he faith also, that all the Citizens of CHERONEA, not one excepted, were compelled themselves to carry upon their shoulders, a certain measure of Corn to the sea coast, which is before the Isle of ANTICYRE: and yet they were driven forward, whipped with many a fore lash. Again, as they were preparing for a second journey, and that every man had his burthen ready, news came that Antonius had loft the battle before Actium, which faved CHERONEA. For Antonius commissioners and souldiers fled immediately, and the Citizens 00003

among those of his time, and of whom Plusareh maketh often mention in his books, where he speaketh of talk at the table: how that he had been in company with other learned men at many feafts, where there was no talk but of learning and matters of Philosophy. He speaketh also of his father, the fon of Lampriae, not expressing his name although he representath him discoursing of many points of Philosophy, and namely in the books above mentioned. Of this Philosopher then the fon of Lamprisa were born many children, and amongst others Plutarch, Timon, and Lamprisa: all which three were very carefully brought up and instructed in the liberal sciences, and in all the parts of Philosophy: unto the which, they shall ever see an humble reverence toward their grandfather membred that Platarch in those books speaking of his grandfather, he makes always honourable mention of him. And as for his father, in the instruction of those that deal in affairs of the estate, he reporteth that he being young was fent with another in embaffage to the Pro-conful, and his companion remaining upon fome occasion behind, he went thither alone: and executed the commission,

And at his return, as he would have given the Commonwealth account openly, and have made report of his charge and Embaffage, his father rifing up alone, forbad him to fay, I went, but we went; and I spake, but we spake: and so commanded him to make his report, always joyning his companion with that he had done. We fee in the treaty of brotherly love, how heartily he loved

The amity and in many places out of their table talk. Whereupon in respect of the grandsather and father, I resarch and his

ny favours, which deferve that I should be thankfull to her for them, yet there is none that maketh me so much bound to her, as the love and good will my brother Timon hath born, and doth bear unto me in all things: the which no man can deny to be true, that hath but a little frequented our company. And in his talk at the table, bringing in his father and brethren with many others, or together, refolving divers questions of Philosophy, he representeth men that with a grounded knowledge had joyned a sweet behaviour, and a wonderfull good understanding, and namely the young Lampring, who was of a pleafant nature, and loved to be metry. Plutarch then having a lather that loved learning and vertue, was in a good hour put out to learning, whereunto he was wholly inclined. And amongst other good masters, he met with Ammonius, an EGYPTIAN born, sith Amounts Plu-tarbe School- Eunapius, who having with great praife taught in ALEXANDRIA, he did also visit the Cities of GREECE, wherein learning did yet flourish, and tarried a great time in ATHENS, respected and well beloved of every man. In the latter end of Themistocles life, Plutarch sheweth that he was a boarder and lying in Ammonium house, and in talk at the table he brought him in, either disputing, The old cut or teaching his Scholars. So the cuftom to teach the youth at that time was very fine and eafe, to give children a taft and learning of vertue: for as the Tutors imployed part of their time to discourse in the presence of their disciples, they occupied them in the same exercise afterwards, and made them declare, and fay their opinion of divers matters: so that in few weeks, by way of sport and recreation, they had run through the fecrets of Philosophy. Unto the which they joyned also, befides their compositions and particular exercises, their familiar talk and recreative disputations in their walks, at their suppers and feafts, where nothing elfe could be heard but that which made the young men wife and vertuous in a fhort space. That may be gathered out of Platarchi writings, and out of those especially where he speaketh how children should be taught, of the lecture of the Poets, how they should hear his talk at the table, and a good number of declamations dispersed in the middeft of his Moral works. In this place I remember that which he himfelf spake in difcourse, how a man should know a slatterer from a friend, touching the direction of this his Tutor. Our master Ammonius, faith be, perceiving in his lecture he made after dinner, that some of his disciples and familiars had made a larger dinner then was fit for Students, he commanded one of his fervants, a freeman to beat his own fon: he could not (faith he) dine without vinegar. When he had spoken that, he cast his eyes upon us: so that they which were indeed culpable, found that he meant it by them. We may see also in the first and second question of his third book of talk at the table, how ready this Philosopher was to sharpen the spirits of young men that frequented him. Thus therefore Plutarch having fo good a help, in few years he profited greatly in the knowledge of all the parts of Philosophy, and never went out of his Countrey, nor travelled to understand strange languages, although the Latine tongue was common in ROME, and in divers places of the ROMAN Empire: which extended it self into GREECE, and beyond, as Plutareh noteth in the end of his Platonicall queftions. Without notwithstanding that he ever profited much in the knowledge of any other tongue, faving in the knowledge of the GREEKS: the which also hath a tast of his Philosophy of BOEOTIA. He doth also confess in the beginning of the life of Demossibenes, that whilest he was in ITALY and in ROME, he had no leifure to fludy, nor to exercise the Latin tongue, as well for the businels he had then in hand, as to satisfie those that frequented him to learn Philosophy of him. So that very late being well stepped on in years, he began to take Latin books in hand, wherein there happened a ftrangething unto him, but yet true notwithstanding: that is, that he did not learn nor understand things so much by the words, as by a certain use and knowledge he had of things, he attained to the understanding of the words. But furthermore (they are his own words) to know how to judge well, wherein consistent the beauty of the Latin tongue, or to speak it readily, or to understand the figures, translations, and the fine knitting of fimple fayings one with the other, which do adorn and beautific the tongue, I think well (faid he) that it is a goodly thing and pleasant: but withall it requiresh a long and laboursome exercise, fit for those that be at better leisure then I am, and that be yet able for age to attend such sineness. That which is above spoken of, sheweth that in that time they learned Sciences in their Mother Tongue, so that even from their Cradle, children began to enter into the School of the Mules, and pierced into the goodlieft fe- Sciences of old Cradie, cuidern organ to enter into the oction of the mines, and present into the goodheit te-crets of the fame, having in their own Tongue the Artis and goodly difciplines difcovered even to learned in the theory of the fame, the state of the good beauty may in learning of wards and what wholes tongue the bottom: whereas prefently the best of our age stealeth away in learning of words, and when we should enter into the knowledge of things, our memory is over-whelmed, and judgment al-tered with an infinity of objects, which (like divers fawces) have more times aftered our right rafte. Infomuch that almost commonly we see, that we delight for the most part to heap together letters upon letters, and after a great provision of strange words, we find our selves children, and void of the true knowledge of things. But now to come again to Plutarch, as touching his fufficiency and his advancement in Sciences, we need not speak of them in particular, considering that his writings do fufficiently prove them, and that we have also spoken something in the preface of his Morall Now, as his good fortune made him meet with excellent mafters, and men very carefull to manure fo noble a spirit : so he for his part answered their hope very sufficiently, shewing himself even from his infancy to the end of his life wholly given to study, with an earnest defire (but well governed) to Platarch given keep his body in health, to content his mind, and to make himself profitable a long time to himself, to study. and to others also. Which was no hard matter for him, having been carefully brought up, even from his cradle, and so well governed, as was requisite to maintain himself long in strength: his fathers house and table being a School of temperance and of frugality. Considering furthermore that talk with learned men was very necessary for him to attain to that which he pretended: and having a mind desirous to excell in all things, he travelled into EGYPT, and talked there of all the ancient Plutarchetta. doctrine with the wifest men, whereof afterwards he made a collection and intituled it, of Isis, and yels. Ofiris: which is yet left unto us, where he sheweth himself to be well studied in the divinity and Philosophy of the EGYPTIANS. From thence he returned again into GREECE, and visited the Towns and Universities where there were any Philosophers, and frequented them all, to gather together the goodly instructions which he hath left us. Moreover he began to make collections, and culled our remembrances not onely out of the books already published, but also of the notable talk and discourse which he understood of the one and the other: also of Registers and Authentical instruments kept in the Towns where he came, whereof afterwards he did most artificially frame the most part of his works. And pretending such a laudable end, the better to establish his conceits, and to speak with a more commendable authority and good manner: he made a journey unto the City of SPARTA, of purpose to see the papers and memories of all the government of this goodly Commonwealth, and of their Law-makers, Kings, and Ephores, and gathered together all their notable deeds and fayings fo carefully as could be possible even to the least words of the simple fouldiers and women of SPARTA, together with all their cuftoms, ordinances, ceremonies, and fashions to live in common, and particularly, in War and in Peace. He did the like in divers other Commonwealths. as his Lives, and the Demands of things pertaining to the GREEKS and ROMANS doth amply prove it : without which collections also it was unpossible for him to have left in writing such particularities, and he could not but of necessary have had communication with a great number of men lovers of Antiquities. Unto that he joyned a curious fearch of Statues, Metrals, Inscriptions, Paintings, Tables: also of Proverbs, Epigrams, Epitaphs, Apophthegms, and other ornaments of Hiftory, to leave nothing behind him. And being continually almost in the company of learned men in all professions, it seemeth his memory was always bent to gather, and his judgement occupied to discern that which was to be rejected or retained. By which means he saw himself in a short time advanced to the knowledge of all things: moreover he had in his hand goodly briefs and collections. with the which he finely holp himself, and afterwards made a good part unto his friends and posterity. He himself at the beginning of his book treating the contentment and quietness of the mind, makes mention of the memories which he had of long time made for his own use. So that out of this Plutarths book rich closet he hath drawn the excellent pieces which have remained unto us, and which shew how of contentment much we have loft being deprived of them that are no more to be found, and the which time hath and quietness dispersed, or utterly consumed.

Now shough that in generall it may be faid, that this man was ignorant in no Learning, nor of the goodly fecrets of Nature : yet this word we must add to it , that whosoever shall duly consider the entrance, continuance, composition, binding and inclosing of his Discourse, be it that he Write an History, or that he by any Treaty apart will put back vice, and make Vertue to be beloved : be it that he sport himself in clearing the difficulties of natural Philosophy, or of the Mathematicks : be it that he beginneth to commence some disputation against those whose opinions he disproved : we Platacht meshall find in his writings an exact and easie method both together, his proofs found, and his in-thod of writing ductions pleasant and agreeable to all forts of wits, and of such pithy discourses, so that of force we must confess, that this person had been most excellently directed in his studies, considering that Plutarch sounin speaking after such an easie manner, he presenteth so profound instructions, and I cannot tell what, deeth of setts where there is always somewhat to be learned. Furthermore, seeing divers Sects in credit in his and converseth time, it seemeth he had a good will to found into the depth of the value and error of them. Then with learned reaching higher yet, he hath fearched out the opinions of the first Sages. So that the Pythagoreans, men. with him. But being not content with turning over the leaves of their Writings, and feeing to the wan min. Dut oring not content wan taking to the end all that which the natural Philosophers have thought of the fecrets of the world: yet would be familiarly frequent those whom he understood to be practised in Sciences, and confer with them, underfland their reasons, and be throughly resolved of them: and at the length obtained his desire, as his books make mention. That was accompanied with a continual reading of all forts of good Authors, as well to amplifie his collections, as still more and more to enrich his memory, and to polith his judgment; as may be noted in his Worksthree feveral Excellencies of his fpirit. For some of them are certain declamations made in the School, and by way of exercise, as we have shewed them, placed at the beginning of the fame : fo that if he would have taken the pains to have reviewed and imoothed those pieces there, they would have seemed to be other then they were. But we perceive that he left fome unperfect, not thinking that that (which ferved not but for a proof of fome thing better Plut of the lives laboured) deferved to come to light. There are also some other discourses better politically and morals be furth fort notwithstanding, that it plainly appeareth, he might have amplified them and made them berter. And there be other pieces, unto the which it may be faid, he hath put his laft hand : as are bis Lives, and the most part of his Morall works written at leifure, very adviedly, considered in all understanding and to divers recreations. He could have done the like in all, and with the like stile have raifed his Writings to their perfection : but having as it were more exprelly flayed himfelf upon some, he hath shewed therein the disposition of his studies, and with what discretion he spent his time.

Now, though he had tafted of all the Sects of the Philosophers, yet you may perceive that in clining to the Platonians (for he greatly reverenced Socrates and Plato, whole birth-days he did yearly celebrate) he nevertheless thut himself within the bounds of modesty of certain Aca-Platurch a fol- DENICKS, being content fimply to propound the things, but to leave them to the judgement of Platario a 101- BENIA CAP, Comp. Description of Plato, the Readers, forcing no man. Furthermore, we fee with what diligence he had turned over the leaves and an enemy of the Writings of the Epicureans, and of the Stoicks; against whom he stoutly opposed himself, to the Epicary of the Virtungs of the Application of the Rational, the Natural, and Mathematicks (the which he had greatly (tudied) they were but simple pastimes in comparison of the other. Whereupon may be differend, that having received in himfelf a fingular pleafure of fuch study, he always fought to print the same desire and contentment in the thought of all men, leaving the speculations and pricking queftions: onely tending to this good, to bring wildom into the houses, to establish it in the Thrones of Kings, to make it go in the streets, to lodge it in the eyes and ears, upon the tongues, and in the bottom of the hearts of all men. See here what his thoughts have been, which he could well digeft afterwards: fo that it feemeth he was altogether given to that. Now though he was occupied in meditations and fo excellent works, he forgot not therefore any thing that was requifite for the exercises of his body, such as menused at that time, to keep their spirits in strength, as also more joyfully to pass over so many other crosses as our life is assailed withall. And we may dily exercites and his skill in fee also in the precepts he hath written of health, that albeit Physick was not his profession, nevertheless he learned that which was the principall for his own private good. For in that book of his, he speaketh reasonably of the use of meats, and sheweth from what meats we should abstain. Afterwards having declared in what fort one should use his appetite and the pleasures of the body, he condemneth the excels of drinking and eating, he teacheth how to prevent fickness, fetteth down remedies, Treateth of Diet, and of figns of fickness, and of the true ways how to keep health. And thereupon he cometh to reason of the exercises and diet of Students, laying that open which we should most carefully observe therein: which maketh nie believe, that he having known fo wellwhat was fit for the prefervation of the body, he did wifely help himfelf: as allo

even to very old age he hath born Office in the Commonwealth, and always carried a body and mind lufty and ready to take pains, having had this wildom, to confider well his nature and difpofition: also to take such meats and drinks as were good for his stomack, and to use them soberly, and keeping his body in good state by commendable exercises and nouriture, to make him profit able a long time for humane fociety. It is the, that he being a graveman, raifed to honour, and a Philosopher by protestion, his chiefest exercises of body were to talk with other learned men, where without contention of words, he always decided fome points of Philosophy. Furthermore he loved to talk at the table, and to mingle pleafant grave matters with fome new device: fo wittily and sweetly to enterlace and divide the course of his life, being no crabbed nor fullen person, but pleasant, and whose company was troublesom to none: and otherwise as sober and discreet in his talk, as he was in

So then his manners, as well alone, as with his friends and openly, do shew, that truly he had a good foul within a body well tempered. Now I do not enter here into the examination of the ridiculous opinions of Plutarch in matter of Religion, being forry that fo rare a spirit hath been so miferably environed with the darkness which was at that time in the most part of the Towns and Men Platarch igno- of Greece, and especially among so many wise men, strangely ignorant and dull in respect of rantof the true the knowledge of the true God. If we had not been warned betimes by the true and onely wife men raught in the School of erernal wildom, of fuch a judgement of God upon the wife men of the world, who have been confounded in their discourse, when there hath been question of the honour due to our toversign Lord: then we might have been aftonied, and remained as men caft away. And whereas fo many great wife men have erred in their ways, that will not excufe them before their Judge, as if he had kept the light from them. For, fince that which may be known of his eternity and omnipotent power, hath been revealed unto them in nature and in Philosophy: flaying a man upon himself, or upon other creatures, and forfaking the onely Creator, they condemn themfelves by their own words and writings. Now to come again to Platarch. He having been Apolle's Prieft, as himself consesseth, a d from his youth suckled with the foolish doings of the GREERS: I do not find it firange, that many about opinions and without good ground (yea wicked and pernicious) are featurered in his disputations, touching the default of Oracles, of the Religion of the Jevys, of the inscriptions of the letter ET in the Temple of Delphos: why the Prophetels Pythia doth no more give her Oracles in Verle; and in many places of the Lives and works, in the which he openly inclineth to the superfittions and Atheisms of the PAGANS. There he sheweth a conscience evil informed, and a man running very swiftly out of the right way. By the lame means a man may plainly note that in matter of supernatural and divine Philosophy, another manner of light then that of our corrupt understanding is wholly required, not being possible that a man left to his own wit can comprehend the things which are of God: because they are discerned after a fashion meerly unknown unto him, and of the which he cannot be partaker but by a speciall grace, and which nature doth not bestow upon him, but he which hath made and reformed nature. It is no marvell then if Plutarch should be misled, that hath had so many instructions and masters strayed from the way of Eternal Truth, and whose predecessors were drowned in the bottomies pir of ignorance. Yet notwithstanding, in the middest of that darkness he hath had so much light, that he feemeth, at times, to note and condemn the Labyrinth of errour, as a man that hath loft his way in an horrible dark night, should from one time to another be directed rightly by the light of the flashings of lightning. For fome do gather by his discourse of the Cessation of the Oracles, and by other places, that he did acknowledge one God, and very liberally condemned many old and new superstitions, unto the which both himself, and others his like, did cleave, rather by custom for fashions fake and to please the people then for any opinion they had that they were ought worth. But as I have faid, my intentions is not to judge this person nor his deeds : considering that besides the matter I touch (every where, where he goeth out of the way) he confuteth himself sufficiently: witness his discourse of superstition, and the seventh Chapter of his first Book touching the opinions of the Philosophers, where he will dispute of the Eternal Providence : and the third question of the second Book at talk of the table, making mention of the egg; and the last question of the fourth Book, where he meddleth with speaking of God, and of the Ceremonies of the Jewys. In the mean time, and in the middeft of this great blindness, they see in Plusarch a heart that is enemy unto vice, and a friend of good manners. Let a man fee him in his Family, in the School, in Banquets. with his Friends, and openly: behold, there is a grave man modelt in behaviour, fharp, learned and Plut arch pleafant in his Discourses, offending nor hurting no man. If he speak of vice, he letteth out the fil- wherein he is thiness, and feantly maketh the patient cry. If he spake for vertue, it is with such efficacy, that every commendable. man may know he spake of the abundance of his heart. He is a good Father of a house, a wife School-malter, a grave Historian, a brave Politician, an extellent Philosopher, a good Writer to imitate: and furthermore, a faithfull, profitable, true, and a joyfull counsellor and friend. His plainness, simplicity, and grave modefty shineth in all his writings: his vertue, accompanied almost ordinarily with all other things, which we need not speak of particularly, neither to unfold the life of our Philosopher from one part to another to fee his uprightness, integrity, gravity, fweetness, constancy, force, prudence, temperancy, and liberality: that may be truly spoken of him, which had been long time before applyed in the Theatres unto Amphiaram, and to Ariftides.

He little cares to feem upright, but striveth fo to be, In deepelt thoughts preferring vertue still : Whence day by day, proceeding we do fee Wife counsels, that without respect, true honours laws fulfill.

In testimony of his fweet Gravity, and of part of his thoughts, I will alledge some word couched in his own Discourse against Choler. As for me, faid he, If I have done well or evil I know not not by that means I have rid my felf of Choler. As the LACEDEMONIANS did in old time, who Plutarche to learn their children not to be drunk at all, shewed them their slaves being drunk : so do I con-speeches afidet the effects of Choler in others. And afterwards he addeth more, that a man should accustom gaint choler? himself to bear many of his wives words, and of his familiars and friends, which do reprove us for that we are too gentle and fort. And this was the chiefest cause (said he) why I was so often angry with my fervants, fearing they would wax worse for want of reproof and correction. But I obferved my felf at the laft, though laire, that first I were better by patience and pardoning them, stake my fervants worse, then to burt my felf by standards and choice, seeking to reform others. I considered also with my felf, and remembred (faid he) that as he which teachests us to shoot in a Bow, doth not forbid us to draw, but to fail in drawing : so he that teacheth us to punish in time and place, moderately, profitably, and as we should : doth not let us but that we may punish. I do labour all I can to withdraw, and utterly to banish all choler : principally because I would not take from them that are punished, the mean to justifie themselves, and to hear them. For time bringeth, in the interim to the passionate mind, a delay and forgetsulicis, which dissolveth it: in which space the independent of reason findeth both the mean and the measure to give reasonable correction. And besides that, they give the party punished no place to resist the punishment, if he be not corrected in anger and choler, but convinced for that he had well deferved it. And (which were yet more unseemly) they shall not find that the servant punished speaketh more justly then his master that punisheth him. Touching this purpose, I will remember the pleasant report which the Philotopher Taurus made of Platareh, as Gellius reciteth it in the fix and twentieth Chapter of the first book of his Nights Attiques, as some man hath heretofore expressed it in our language. A flave, a vile and vicious man (but yet that had his ears somewhat instructed with books and disputations of Philosophy) having been stripped naked for some fault he had done, by the commandment of his Mafter Plutarch, whilest they were whipping of him, he grumbled at the first that it was without reason, and that he had done nothing: but in the end crying out amain, and injuring his Mafter, he told him that he was no Philosopher as he braged himself to be: and that he often nis matter, ne totu ilitu that he was no i ilitolophet as he bragen infinite to be; and that ne often heard him fay it was a fowl thing to be angry, yea that he made a book of it; and that now (over-come with Choler) in making him be beaten to cruelly, he unterly belief all his Writings. Therence with Choler in making him be beaten to cruelly, he unterly belief all his Writings. Therence to Platarch coldly and quietly answered: Why, how now Roifter, faid he? whereby doft thou think that I am angry at this prefent? My countenante, my voice, my colour, my words, do they give the any fign that I am angry ? I do not think I have cruel eyes, nor a troubled face, nor any fearfull cry. Do I blush ? do I fome? doth any thing cleape me that I should repent me? do I statumetry. Do I rage? For to tell thee truely, these be the shews of Choler. Afterwards he turned to him that whipped him: faying, Forward with your bufiness, whiles he and I do reason the matter. Furthermore, we may eafily gather what Plutarch was amongst his friends, from the nine books containing the questions decided at the table. And for his disputations against the EPICUREANS and STOICKS, they flew that this perion for the regard of his actions concerning the Commonwealth, having respect unto those whom at that time he made his Judges, and to the posterity into weath, naving scipes among the combeneafter, he always carried himself in such a modest gravity, whose hands his writings might combeneaster, he always carried himself in such a modest gravity, that they could require no more of him. And if fornetime he did feelingly touch fome, as Colotes, and Herodorus, it was not in vain. Also he always used terms which witnessed that he had an upright foul. To be short, it appeareth everywhere that his passions were marvellous well stayed. And if any of them were furious or violent, he could tell in time and place how to reform them by the pre-Platerth ruled cepts of Philosophy, leading (as is faid) a life without blame of men. But above all the reft, when well his affe- any difcourfe or diffound drew him into it, to speak of shamefull or disthonest things, he did well his affeconvey it with fuch diferetion as it cannot be amended : whereof we need not to bring forth examples dispersed in his writings, and especially in the Dialogue of Love, seeing that being concealed it doth no hurt, as also remembred or too expresly revealed, it cannot but hurt the eyes, and an honest Furthermore, Plutarch: study of Philosophy took not away the care he had to live with some profit amongst men, nor made him to dildain the means which his predecessors had lest him. But as he came of a noble house, and with time being advanced unto office and charge in the Commonwealth, greatly efteened of Trajan the Emperor, and of the Noble men of ROME, he saw he had goods enough to live at eafe; whereof notwithflanding he never made fuch account as that he would forget fludy, and intangle himfelf in the fnare of the love of riches, in the which fo many mifer-Flurnels child able fouls have been engaged unto death. His means ferved his turn to maintain himfelf among his friends, and to bring up his children: for he had many of an honourable Lady which he married, and loved most dearly. Amongst his other fons, himself maketh mention of Autobulus, of Plus tarchus, and of Charon, who died a young infant, and fome others whom he nameth not at all. Alfo of daughters, two of the which were married to Firmus, and unto Craton, learned Philosophers: and Timoxene, who died very young. As for Autobulus, he married in his fathers life time, and is not well known, whether Sextim of Cheronea, a Philosopher of the Scepts, who lived in great honour in the Empire of Antonius, was his fon, or the fon of Plutarchus. That which I am now about to speak of, may be gathered out of divers places in the works of Plutarch, and specially of heddisons to the substitute of the second states ally of the discourse at the table. And in the consolation which he wrote to his wise upon the death of their daughter, they may note that the was an honourable Lady, modeft, and vertuous, well attended on will women and fervants, and otherwife loving to her children, and bearing great reverence unto her husband. That the house of Plut areh was very well governed: that he had a great number of house well governed. we may know that his Sons and Nephews were studious and learned, and specially in the fixt queflion of his eighth book of talk at the table, speaking of his youngest children; who because they tarried somewhat longer at the Theatre then they should have done, to see and hear the pastimes they made there, came by that means late to supper : is shewed sufficiently that they now began to follow the fathers steps. And there appeared in no part any evil touch amongst these persons, but as Plusarch did conversein a singular reverence, friendship and gentleness, with his Grandsather, his Father and his brethren, we are to judge the like conversation with his Wife, his Children, and his Nephews: 25 also they being in so good a School, could not fail but every day to go forward in the knowledge and

But as a fountain hidden ferveth to no use, so it had little prevailed Plutarch to have feen, read, and gathered fo much together, unless he had made little ftreams run from such a lively and goodly fountain, unto such places where his vertue might shine more then in any other parts of the Where Pla-World. That was ITALY, and the City of ROME, the feat of the Empire, and where (not-tarchy retrues withfranding the difforders brought in by former Wars, and by the diffolutions and tyranniss of fone Emperose) there were many learned men, and in the Emperors Court also fome counfellors, and other persons of authority which loved vertue. Now Plutarch having begun to advance himself in GREECE, about the time of Vespasian and Titus, it seemeth he came to Rome immediately after What moved the death of Titus, under Domitian, as well to make profession there of Philosophy, as also that he Plutareb to might more nearly know the ancient government of the Commonwealth, and to encrease his collecti- come to Rome. ons, from the which proceeded afterwards infinite particularities inclosed in his works: but especially the Lives of the noble ROMAN'S compared with the GREEKS. For my part, I think Plutarch was drawn to Rome by means of some friends he had there, especially by Soffine Senecio, that had been a Conful, who was of great estimation at that time, and namely under the Empire of TRAJAN. And that which maketh me think fo, is because of Plutarchs own words, who faith in the beginning of his first book of his discourse at the table, that he gathered together all his reasons and discourses made bere, and there, as well in ROME with Senicio, as in GREECE with Plutarch and others. Not being likely that he would have taken the pains to have made fo long a voyage, and to have come to fuch a City where he understood not their vulgar tongue, if he had not been drawn thither by Senecio, and fuch other men: as also in acknowledgment of the good turns and honour he had received by fuch men, he dedicated divers of his books unto them, and among others, the Lives unto Senecio, and the nine volumns of his discouse at the table; with the treaty, How a man may know that he profiteth in vertue. Now for the time, confidering what he faith in the end of his book against curiofity. I fupposethat he taught in ROME in the time of Titus and of Domitian: for touching that point, he maketh mention of a noble man called Rusticus, who being one day at his lecture, would not open a let. The revergees ter which was brought him from the Emperor, nor interrupt Plutarch, but attended the end of his de- a noble man clamation, and untill all the hearers were gone away : and addethalfo, that Rustiens was afterwards gave Plunach put to death by the commandment of Domitian. Furthermore, about the beginning of the Life of Demosthenes, Plutarch faith, that whilest he remained in IT ALY and at ROME, he had no leisure to study the Latin Tongue: as well for that he was bufied at that time with matters he had in hand, as also to fatisfie those that were his followers to learn Philosophy of him. He doth not tell what matters he had in hand befides his profession: but following that which Suidas and others spake of him, that he was near to the person of Trajan, and had the honour and place to be his Schoolmaster and Teacher, or, at the leaftwife; one of fo many learned men as this Prince made much of, as fome ftory writers to tefifie, he was honoured and advanced to some charge or government : which, I think, is that he speakoth of in this place. Now furthermore, his chiefest labour was publickly to teach all the parts of Philosophy, mingling in his declamations and lectures a diligent and curious fearch of all that the ancient Philosophers, reasonable, naturall, or morall, of what sect soever they were, had treated of: as appeareth by the writings, which are as fummaries of his lessons and Orations he made with his own woice. His feech doth not flow fo as that of many other Philosophers, Orators, and Greek Historians, but being come later, and in a more rude and harsh world, his stile also is more hard, brief, en-Platarchs slile. forced, and Philosopher like: aiming at this mark to instruct the mind first, not tarrying to tickle the ears much, though he did fill and content them learnedly. But the flowing sweetness we tast in Plato, in Xenophon, in Herodotus, and in some other, wanting indeed in Plutarch, is supplied and recompenced in him by infinite ftories, fentences, fimilitudes, and notable particulars which he borroweth of others, and whereof he composed a work so well divided, so rich, and so pleasant, by reason of his variety, that it is not possible to read books of a more gentle and profitable reading, amongst all the Hiftorians, and Philosophers, GREEKS or ROMANS. If Plutarch then doth at this present content all forts of men, what may we think he did with his lively voice? but after the example of this Hercules of GAUL, which held his auditors ears fast chained to his tongue: so hath he by his goodly documents, moved an infinite number of men, to leave vice, and to cloath them with the love of vertue.

So he having continued these exercises for some years, being heard and visited of all forts of men, Plutsichs regrew to be of such reputation, that the greatest persons began to seek him and to make much of him, putation. yea to think themselves honoured by his friendship: as his books dedicated unto some of them do sufficiently testifie it. And touching the access he had about the person of Trajan himself, it may be gathered from the beginning of his goodly collection of Apophthegmes, which he dedicated to this great thered from the beginning of his goodily collection of Apoplangians, which in teachiaction his great Emperor, what was his intention: that is to wit, to ferve for the good of all the ROMAN Empire, giving wholesome instructions unto the head thereof. For he wisely judged, that in ruling the thoughts of great imof that man, it was to give Phylick at once unto all the subjects of that great Monarchy. The same be-portance, ing a common thing, that

> Subjects and Kingdoms commonly do chuse The manners that their Princes daily ufe.

It is true that fuch instructions, in respect of Trajan, do onely concern his person and Politick affairs. For as touching the onely true Religion, it was meerly unknown of Plutarch, and rudely persecuted under the Empire of Trajan: who notwithstanding in the end being softened by the precepts of moral Philosophy, and through the advertisements his deputy governors gave him, and namely Plinius fecundus governor of BITHYNIA, of the innocency of the Christians: or rather restrained by the secret providence of our soveraign Lord (who excellently strengthened his, put the Oracles Trajan forbad of the lying spirit to silence, and overthrew Idolatry in most places) he carried himself more gently, of Christians. and did forbid to vex and trouble them any more, whom before they had purfued with all forts of cruelties. Furthermore, I think that it was in favour of Trajan chiefly, that Plutarch made without oppressing or wronging any man : for he was a noble Prince, that defired rather to he be-he shewed himself courteous, and easie to have access unto: grave and honourable among the Senators. The ROMANS loved him as much as they could possible, and his Enemies infinitely were afraid of him. His Pastimes were hunting, feasting and the Theater to see common Playes and Sports. Oftentimes he would be private with his friends, and came without his Guard into their houses; yea sometimes he would lye there, and pass away the night. He was not of the wisest, although by his behaviour they could not judge otherwise of him, but that he was a wife and learned

Friends. Furthermore, he was fo fortunate and brave a Chieftain of an Army, fo beloved of his

Captains and Souldiers, that there was never any mutiny or diforder in his Camp. That made him dreadfull to those that troubled him near or far off, of which the chiefest was Decebalus King of the with divers events, but almost always to his advantage. Furthermore, to come to his manners, he

Guard, first he made Sura his Physician come to him, and shewed him his eyes to help some grief that troubled him: not being so contented, he sendeth for his Barber to shave his beard: then being trimmed, and having washed, he sate down at the Table and supped. The next morning some reporting unto him the ill will that Sura did bear him: If he would have killed me, faid he, vefterday he might have done it, for he had means to do it. This Sura was he unto whom Trainn had given the Office of the great Marshall of the Empire: and coming to him to tie his girdle baudrick-wise about his neck, having the Sword drawn in his hand, he used this speech unto him : receive this Sword of me, and if I command as I ought, imploy it in my defence: If I do otherwise draw it against me, and take my life from me. He caused Statues to be set up of Soffin Senecio, of Palma, and of Celfu, who were all three Senators whom above all others he loved and honoured. He fet

all other doth commend him, is, that having done wonderfull much good to the Empire, by Decree of the Senate, he was firnamed Optimus Imperator: that is to fay, most good Emperour. And so washe wonderfully beloved of the Senators, and Officers of the Empire, of all the People, and especially of the Souldiers, amongst whom he would be so familiar as if they had been his companions. Furthermore, nothing pleafed him so much as this Title of Optimus: wherein he gloried amongst his friends, and did more and more indeavour to shew himself fo. And also after him (as Eurropius reporteth) when any new Emperour was chosen by the Senate, after the stioutings of Philosopher: and on the other side, that the Philosopher had framed the deeds of the Prince to the rule of good life, which he hath fo fitly propounded to great and mean men. And therefore it is not to be marvelled at , if Platarch declare (to the high praise of Train and the Senate) in his Treaty, where he instructed those that deal in publick Assairs, that in his time for peace sake,

People had no need of wife Governours to defend them : for (faid he) all the Wars against the GREEKS and barbarous People are fled from us. Thus standeth the estate of the Empire, the which if any man will particularly confer with that which Plutarch fetteth down in his Writings, he shall find it was happy to have met with so well disposed hearts, to receive, and carefully to practise his goodly Leffons. And that it was a fingular honour to Trasan by his Vertue to have obtained a Sir-name that made him greater then the most part of the ROMAN Emperours: fo is Plutarch every way to be commended, that was the excellent Instrument to advance and maintain fogreat a good.

Whereupon I desire his Morals should be specially remembred, to apply that which he speaketh of Vice and Vertue, unto that which hath been touched in the Life of Traian. For I think the one can hardly be spoken of , but that the other by the same means must be remembred. And it feemeth that one felf-foul hath put forward these two hearts, both to give and receive one commendable instruction. Onely for proof a man may with his eye run over two or three Discourses.

certain particular Treatifes (besides the Lives of Noblemen) amongst others that, where he maintaineth, that it is requifite a Prince should be wise: The instruction for those that deal in the affairs of estate: the notable sayings of GREEKS and ROMANS, and others concerning the duty of or create: the notable rayings of Organization and Advances, and briefly defendeth (but Princes, and great Lords. Now confidering that wherein he reasoneth, and briefly defendeth (but gravely, and with affured proofs) that a Philosopher ought to converse with Princes, some may gravery, and white anurus proof of Plutarch, against the common and light objections of some Courtiers, which think that Princes cannot be well counfelled, but by men that blow (as they fay) fire with their mouths, and that carry the rapier and dagger in their hands: and would that men of learning (whom in from they call Schoolmafters and Philosophers) should be turned to their study, or into a School, to cry out there as much and as loud as they think good. Therefore he was willing as well to encourage himself first in that discourse, as also to remedy what in him lay, certain evils infinitely abounding and overflowing in others. In all times and ages every man bath granted and confessed, that amongst those that want good company, are Princes, Lords, and great pergood company fonages. For their affairs being to important and weighty, as every man knoweth, their bodies being weak, and their foirits not able to dispatch all things: they must needs see by others eyes, and wean, and there is and the work with others hands. Whereupon there are three forts of men which are to be reproved. For the first, they are the Princes themselves, who instead of calling and drawing near unto them,

Three forts of men of honour that might help them in any matter, they give access unto ill minded men that corrupt them, and overthrow their eftate. The fecond (but a small number at all times) are the Philosophers, that is to say, men of authority, wife, learned, lovers of vertue, and of the good of Princes and of their subjects: who being able to do much, yet they draw back: or being advanced, have not always that confideration nor courage that is fit, being oftentimes carried away with the greatest opinion, and mingling somewhat too much their humane wildom with the apprehension of their duty: whereof their confcience being cleared divers ways, doth fufficiently inform them. on or their cury: whereon their connecticuting current ways, when remaining minimum. For the last, they are ignorant Tutors, or Atherits, minions, shifters, lietters, flatterers, brokers of filthy pleasures, and such practifers, which by wicked means creep into Princes Courts, houses and flores. And in recompence of the charges they boldly accept, and of the treatures which they heap together with a wicked conficience, and do afterwards spend of the same, they do deceive, dishonour, and finally undo their unwise masters: as a million of examples in histories do testifie. Plutarch therefore confidering these things, doth attempt in this Treatile to give courage unto those that have a desire to see all things well ordered: and such manner of men doth he exhort to be about Princes. But because gravity and wisdom maketh men modelt and slow: as to the contrary, ignorance and malice maketh them have brazen faces: he sheweth, that it is no ambition of a Philosopher to be about great Lords, but rather that his duty doth bear it, fithence that fuch receive honour, pleasure and profit: and this he proveth by reasons, and notable examples. But above all, he forgeneth not to fet upon them that come to Princes Courts to make themselves great, shewing that Philosophers should shoot at another mark. And last of all he treateth of the contentment those Plusard bran- receive, which ferving one alone, do by the fame means help an infinite number of others that are detainer that bound unto them for fo great a good turn. I have written at large the argument of this treaty of follow Princes Plutarch, because it containeth the brief of all the conceits of this Philosopher coming to the Encourts to make peror: and it is a pattern also to all learned men that enter into the service of great Lords, which if they will painfully follow, the chiefest may recover some part of their ancient glory. Now I make no doubt of it, but that Plutarch hath affayed by all possible means to practise that which he teacheth in this book, to gain to himself a great contentment in his foul, and to leave a good sent of him un-

The caufe that maketh me speak this, is the consideration of the estate in the which the Empire of ROME frood at that time, the which if any man will at leifure confer with that which he may gather out of many parts of Platarchs works, he shall find the words of Plato very true: that happy are those Commonwealths which are governed by Philosophers, or by Princes that have Philosophers about them. For like as an expert Pilot by his skill and knowledge relifted the wind and billows of the Sea, and in despite of their force beareth fail to the desired haven even so when the ship of the Commonwealth hath a mafter that guideth it by the precepts of Philosophy, the Govern-The benefit of ment is peaceable and happy every way. And if any florm happen, and necessity required it, a wife govershe finely plucketh down the fails, and yieldeth himself in such fort to the waves, that he escapeth for. and overcometh it with honour. Dion writeth, that one of the first acts that Trajan did, after he was cholen Emperor in the place of Nerva, was, that he wrote letters with his own hand to the Senate of ROME promiting by them he would never put any man to death, or make him infamous, that was an honeft man: and this he afterwards confirmed by foleran oath. He put Alianus and the fouldiers Pratorians to death, because they mutined against Nerva. And after he had made his entry into Rome, he gave good order for the affairs of the effate, and specially favoured vertuous men many ways, granted them great priviledges, and gave means to the Cities of ITALY to bring up their youth. He reigned Emperor nineteen years and a half, being two and fourty years old when he was cholen. His behaviour was fuch that he obtained the name of a just, valians, The comment moderate, a good Prince: fo that in the flower of his youth, they noted in him a flayed judgement, and in his age a great courage. loved to faithfully, that it was a hard thing to make him think evill of those whom he loved, which we will prove by some examples. Certain ill-willers brought him word that Sura Licinius, one of Traian gave his private friends, did practife somewhat against him. So could he well acknowledge the good he had received of Plutarch, being a noble and bountifull Honours done Prince, as hath been faid here-before. For, besides the great honour he had done him at ROME, to Plusarch by having made him a Confull, he commanded (as faith Suidas) that all the Magistrates and Officers which were in the Province of SLAVONY, should do nothing but under his Authority. If we had the Books of Marius Maximus, of Fabius Marcellinus, of Aurelius Verus, and of Statius Valins, which have written the Life of Traian: we might eafily draw on this matter further, the which Suidas (according to his stile) is contented to touch in one word. And Dion who was a GREEK, a man very forgetfull for an Hiftorian, and that in some places shewed he had no great judgement: he seemeth to have suppressed the name of Plutarch, as though he had been offended with the same obtained by this man. Or elfe, if one will take things in good part, as I incline unto it, it may be he thought he needed make no mention of one whole Writings made him to be known fufficiently. Yet furthermore, I do not find that Plutarch was in SLAVONIE at all, and if fo be that he made any Journey thither, I think he tarried not long there : because it appeareth in divers places of his Works, that his abode was most in ITALY and in GREECE. And for his honourable charges committed unto him, that should not be thought very strange, if we consider the merits of Plutarch, the names of Traian, and the good will that Soffini Senecio (one of the principal men of ROME, and of the chiefest favourites of Traian) bare unto Plutarch. For he that was in fo great credit with his Mafter, would not forget him whom he loved above all other men : wherein he loft not his time. forasmuch as the Statue that was set up for him, and that which Dion and some others do briefly pass over, do not commend Soffins, as do the Prefaces of Honour, and the Books which Plutarch dedicated unto him. The which we need no more rehearse, then to write over again the Epiftle of Plusarch unto Trasan , the which is written in Latine , as Amyor sheweth in his Preface of the Lives: where he hath inferted the Epistle at length, because he thought it wisely and gravely written, a Brief worthy of fuch a Philosopher as Plutarch. That which Cufpinianus faith in the latter end of the Life of Traian, feemeth to touch this : fpeaking also, as if it had been expressed out of Greek into Latine. But time hath deprived us of that, and of many other goodly peeces of the felf-same, as we have somewhat spoken of it before in the beginning of the Morall Works. Now he bath written nothing touching his behaviour in his publick charge, but contenteth bimself to fpeak a word fometime paffing by, because he made no account of any thing but of Philosophy, through the help whereof he affayed to make himself and others wifer, and more vertuous every day then other. Being a thing very likely, that fuch a man as had so painfully considered of the flate of the World, and of all forts of publick Governments, and had joyned his studies with so great experience: that he hath happily managed the charges that were committed unto him. To conclude, to live as we should amongst men, the speculation and knowledge of things being joyned with the bringeth torth practife of the fame , do bring forth excellent effects : whereas those that do content themselves with the fimple Theorick, and others that follow Exercise, contemning the true understanding of the Causes and Grounds of Affairs, as Philosophy doth shew them, they oftentimes fall into won-derfull difficulties. For Plutareh, though he tarried a long time in ITALY, and in ROME, yet that took not away the remembrance of the sweet air of GREECE, and of the little Town where he was born : but being touched from time to time with a Sentence of an ancient Poet, who faid, that

In what foever Countrey men are bred, (I know not by what sweetness of it led) They nourish in their minds a glad defire Unio their native homes for to retire :

tarchs Lives.

Platach retur- He refolved to go back into GREECE again, there to end the rest of his days in rest and honour amongst his Citizens, of whom he was honourably welcomed home. Some judge that he left ROME after the death of Traian, being then of great years, to lead a more quiet life. So being then at reft, he earnestly took in hand that which he had long thought of before, to wit, the Lives: and took great pains in it untill he had brought his Work to perfection, as we have done at this prefent : although that some Lives, as those of Scipio African, of Metellus Numidicus, and some other are not to be found. Now himself confesseth in some place, that when he beganthis Work, at the first it was but to profit others: but that afterwards it was to profit himself , looking upon those Hiftories, as if he had looked in a glass, and feeking to reform his life in fome fort, and to formit in the mould of the vertues of these great men: taking this fashion of searching their manners, and writing the Lives of these Noblemen, to be a Familiar haunting and frequenting of them. Also he thought (faid he himself) that he lodged these men one after another in his house, entring into consideration of their qualities, and that which was great in either of them, choosing and principally taking that which was to be noted, and most worthy to be known in their fayings and deeds. In summe, he declared that by continuance of reading ancient Histories, and in drawing out the Lives which he hath written, and retaining daily in his understanding the memorable things of the most bonest and vertuous men of times past, he instructed himself, and prepared him to lay aside all evil, soolish, dishonest, or spightfull conditions, if by chance, by often frequenting their company he must of necessity keep, he kearned any evill touch: the which he did reform, turning his quier thought, not ftirred with any passion at all, to the consideration of so many goodly examples. Now because that some might object unto him, that for the finishing of so great a piece of work, he could not have made choice of a fitter place then Rome : or rather that being a man given to his Book as he was , he should have lest that Work unto some other that had feen more. This obje-Aion being of fome weight, he answereth it at the beginning of the Life of Demosthenes . and faith : That to attain to true telicity, (whereof the greatest part confisheth in the manners, qualities, and condition of the foul) it maketh no matter whether a man be born in an obscure Town and of Northe place, fmall name, no more then if he were born of a foul or little Mother. For it were a mockery to but good manthink that fome fmall Towns or little Islands could not with standing bring forth good Poets and think that fome fmall Towns or little Islands could not with standing bring forth good Poets and the standard man cellent Players of Comedies: and that they could not in like fort bring out an honeft, just, constant, wife, and noble or worthy man. And although we have reason to think, that Arts and Sciences. invented to make things necessary for the use of men, or else to win a name and reputation, are made and counterfeited in poor little Towns: fo we must also think that Vertue, none otherwise then a ftrange Plant, can take foot and root in any place, where it meeteth with a good nature, gentle and patient to endure pains. Wherefore if we come to commit an errour, or that we live otherwife then becometh us, we must not accuse or blame the meanness of our Countrey, but justly attribute the fault to our felves. It is true (faith he) that he that hath undertaken to frame a piece of Work . or to write any History, in the which many things should be put, not familiar in his Countrey, and that they find not always at their hand every where , but strange for the most part , dispersed here and there, and that must be gathered from many places and divers Authours : in truth he must first and before all other things dwell in a great and noble City, full of People, and a great number of men loring goodly and honeft things, to the end there may be store of Books, and that in searching up and down, and hearing them tell with lively voice many things, which other Story-writers peradventure have left unwritten, and that shall bear so much more credit, because they are tresh in memory of the living: he may make his Work compleat and perfect in all things, and not wanting many things that should be necessary for it. Having made this Presace, he exculeth himself, that he could not profit so much in knowledge of the Latine Tongue, as he defired, and sheweth how he did help himself. But forasmuch as it is in this Work of his Lives that Plutarch had most shewed his sufficiency, whether you consider the length of the Work; or try with what judgement he had proceeded : peradventure it will not be hurtfull to speak somewhat of it, beside that which hath been spoken by his Tranflator in the Preface. I do not enter here into commendation of History in generall, nor we need not apply that unto Plutarch, which Gicero and many others have spoken. For if ever there were The commen-Books , next to that we call the holy Scriptures , it may be faid , that that which containeth the Lives dation of Pluof the noble GREEKS and ROMANS, is an affured testimony of many hundreds of years, a tarths Lives, Sun of Verity , a Life of Memory , a true Miltress of Life , and an excellent Messenger of Antiquity. And as the Stone called the Opall, sheweth many orient colours above all other precious Stones: fo do the Lives of Plutarch make an abridgement of all the best things contained in the Greek and Latine Histories. For there are seen worthy examples of Vices and Vertues, and infinite number of Maximes, and notable Precepts touching the duties of every one, their Vertues and Vices. Now although Plutarch in the ignorance and blindness of the true God, could not (no more then other profane Historians) touch the true end of History : yet we may note some admirable thing in him in that respect. Since History (which containeth in it an infinite number of particular deeds and honourable actions, as the Collection of the Lives of Platareb) is a Gods Provigoodly glistering Glass or Table, within the which may be different the wonders and admirable dence may be working of Divine Providence. For to comprehend that well which God and men do, there are feen in Hillothree things to be confidered in every History: to wit, the men whereof there is a question, the ries, in which three things to be commerced in every rimory; to wit, the new waters in determining the Epicureans and the circumflances, keeping this ground against the Epicureans and the remarkance in the Epicureans and the Epicureans are the Epicureans and the Epicureans are the Epicureans ar maintaineth the World, wherein nothing happeneth by chance, but all is guided by a most wife Civill State. disposition of the same, for the preservation of Families, of Civil Policy, and of a Company and Church, and happy Congregation that shall be taken out of this World into a better. A wife and lear- preferred by ned Historian must have an eye upon these three things, for to apply them unto three other Verdence. tues that ought to shine in him: Verity, Moderation, and Eloquence. For almuch as if he set Verity, Modeout Fables, or if he talk to no purpole, and make Discourses at pleasure, or if he be troublesome ration, and Ein a Speech not coherent and hanging well together : then he deserveth no more the name of an loqueace, the in a Speech not coherent and hanging well together: then he deterved no more the hand of an evertues of an Historian. As for these Vertues, I do affure my self that every man of judgement will agree, vertues of an Historian, to that they are readily to be found in Plutarch, accompanied with a fweet gravity that always plea- be found in feth the Reader, and giveth him at an hundred times Reading as good a favour and tafte of him as Planach. at the first. Let a man look upon Stories that have nothing in them but the Name, and upon fo many Books ill composed, of the which Europe is full : they find that the parts necessary to be observed in the persons, is nothing at all regarded: that those which think to represent others, they do sample them after a strange sastion. Thereupon the affections and passions, the harred, the envy, evill speaking, false reports, flatteries and lies, present themselves so untowardly, that they mar all. To the contrary, we fee Plutarch very exact in that respect. It sufficeth me to touch the Plutarch a difthings passing by : whether he shew the vices or vertues of great or of mean persons, he doth it in creet Hillorian good terms, without aggravating or making it lefs. He taketh no manner of pleasure to speak evill of any, but wifely hideth that whereof we ought not to speak but with shame and compassion of mans infirmity. And he is more enclined to commend the good in vicious persons, then too much to fet open the shops of their wickedness, But if necessity enforce him unto it, it is with such manifest proofs, that others which are wicked feeing him wash the head of their Companions, Marters remembed in Histories.

they are compelled to hang down their heads, and to condemn their wicked thoughts. Now touching matters that ought to be remembred in Histories , therein are to be considered , the counsells, executions, and accidents. For counfels, who noteth better then he; the wickedness of those which ask counsell of the World, of the unconstant multitude, of men of as little judgement as themselves, or of themselves? With what grace doth he lay open the crrors committed by Xerxes, Pyrrhus; Marius, and infinite others? and though evil counfell prosper for a time, yet the eternall Wisdom hath a fecret intention to bring things to pass, which the Wisdom of a man cannot see till it be done i as Platarch doth finely discover them in the Life of Cato Utican, and of others. The executions are of divers forts, according to the Workmen and their means. In this point Platarch is admirable, shewing particularly infinite thoughts in actions which he reprefenteth: fo that for one felf-deed he given always entrance and direction unto the studious Reader, to make half a dozen of fundry rules for the direction of mans life : he was ever fo fortunate to comprehend all things well, and to draw that which was to be offered unto the view of Posterity. If accidents come in question, he can excellently refer them to the counsels, and draw out goodly instructions for all forts of men. Now there remainesh the circumftances of times, of places, of People, and others fo diligently fearched in Platareh, that in this matter he seemeth to have surmounted himself. To prove all that hath been presently spoken in few words, behold here the Book lieth open, and under the indifferent examination of the learned

I am not ignorant that fome men well thought of among the learned men of our time, have very and vertuous men. boldly cenfured Platarch, accusing him of ignorance: also that he had written things incredible and Platered defen- fabulous, and that he had made unapt comparisons. For his ignorance, that hath been sufficiently handled heretofore speaking of Plurarchs tongue. And if we must speak of the sufficiency of an Historian, I think it is most excellent in him: howbeit I shall not need to defend him, seeing that he desendeth himself sufficiently well. If he be mistaken in some circumstances, and that they discover fome fault in his memory, or of discordance condemned by many other Historians: that deserveth not fo sharp a reprehension. And for all the reft , I will add to the answer of a Noble Person, well studied in Plutarch: Lecture, for that it sufficeth and fully agreeth with that which we now fpeak of. And these be his words: If one had spoken simply that Platarch reciteth things otherwife then they be, it was no great reproach: for those things which we have not feen, we take them at other mens hands of credit; and I fee that to his knowledge he reporteth at times one self-History diversly. As the judgement of three of the best Captains that ever were, given by Hannibal, is otherwife fet down in the Life of Flaminius: and contrary again in the Life of Pyribu. But to charge him to have taken for ready Money things uncredible, and also unpossible, it is even to accule for want of judgement, the Authour of the best judgement in the World. And here is the example which they alledge, to wir, that Pintarch faid, that a child of LACEDAMON fulfered his belly to be torn our by a Fox he had ftoln, and hid under his Gown, even to fuffer death, rather then to bewray his theft. First of all I find this example very evill chosen to bound the indeavours of the faculties of the foul, whereas for corporall forces we have more Law to limit and know them. For this caule, if I had had to do withall, I would rather have cholen an example of the second fort, and they are less credible. As amongst others, that which he recitethof Pyrrhu, that being hurt as he was, he gave his Enemy armed at all pieces such a blow with his Sword, that he clave his head down to the lowest parts, so that the body sell afunder in two parts. In the other example I find no great wonder, neither do I like the excuse they make for Plutareb, for that he added to this word (as they fay) to advife us, and to be wary in our carriage and behaviour. For unless it be in things received by Authority, or in reverence of Antiquity or of Religion, he would not himfelf have received nor have made us believe things of themselves incredible. And that this word (as they fay) is not used in that place to that purpose, is easie to be judged : for that he himfelf reporteth in another place upon the subject of the patience of the children of LACEDAMON, of examples that fell out in his time unlikelier, to perfuade us. As that which Ciero allo hath teftified before him , for that he was (as he faid) even in the very places : that even till their time there were children, for proof of patience, that were tried before the Altar of Diana, who suffered Things feem then felves to be whipped until the bloud ran down their legs, not onely without crying, but allo ing incredible without weeping, yea and fome of them even to death. And that which Plus are telleth with an hundred witnesses: that at a Sacrifice a burning coal being fallen into a Boys sleeves of the La-CEDAMONIANS, as he was cenfing, he fuffered all his arm to be burnt, untill the very favour of the burnt flesh came to them that were present. There was nothing according to their custome that did more difgrace them, and for the which they should suffer more reproach and sname, then to be taken stealing. I am so instructed with the greatness of these men there, that it seems to me, that this report which Plutarch made should not be incredible, or not so much as rare or strange. Marcellin also reporteth, touching this matter of theft : that in his time there could be found no manner of torture or torment how cruell foever that could force the EGYPTIANS taken with theft, (whereunto they were accustomed and hardned) once to tell their names. I know that there were certain poor Countreymen, in the miferable Civill Wars, that did endure the frying of the foles of their feet against the fire, and the nipping off their fingers ends, to thrust their bloudy eyes our of their heads, their foreheads being fast bound with a great cord, before they would be ransomed. I have seen one left stark naked in a ditch for dead, having his neck swollen with a halter than the start of the same of the s tied about it, with the which they had dragged him at a Horfe tail all night long, his body thrult in LUTARCH. with a Dagger in an hundred places, not to kill him, but to make himfelffull of pain : who had endired all that, having loft his speech and senses, resolved (as he told me) to die a thousand deaths. rather then to promife any thing; and he was one of the richest Labourers in all the Countrey. We must not judge that which is possible and that which is not, as it is credible and uncredible to our capacity. It is also a great fault, (unto the which notwithstanding the most part of men do fall) to make it nice to believe that thing of another man, which we our felves cannot do. This is that which Men are not to make it fuce to occure that thing of another hand, touching the fact of the boy of LACEDANON fet believe that of out to accuse our Platarch overthwardly with a lie. The other example which they alleadge of in-functions another, which out to accure our Financia ore tilinaria, poken by Flutarch, is: that Agefilam was condemned in cannot do, a Fine by the Ephores, because he alone had won the hearts and good wills of all his Citizens. I know not what note of falshood they find in that : but so it is , that Plutarch speaketh of things which he should better know then we. It was no new thing in GREECE to see men punished and banished onely for that they were too great with their Citizens; witness the Oftracisme and Petalisme. And where they accuse Plutarch, that he did not well fort the GREEKS with the Ro-MANS: witneffes, Demosthenes and Cicero, Aristides and Cato, Lylander and Sylla, Pelopidas and Marcellus, Agefilans and Pompey; judging that he favoured the GREEKS, for that he gave them companions fo little refembling them : which is justly, to blame Plutarch for that wherein he was most excellent and praise-worthy. For in his Comparisons (which is the most admirable part of Plutarchs his Works, and in the which (in my opinion) he took more delight then in any other of his Wyrist of first by indigenents, equalleth their protoundness and their weight.

of malice and fallhood. I think that which hath been the cause of this censure, is the great shining colour of the names of the ROMANS which we have in hand. It appeareth not to us that Deme-fibenes can equall the glory of a Confull, Proconfull, or Quartor of this great Common-wealth. But he that shall consider the truth of the thing, and the men in themselves, whereat Plut arch ever most aimed: and to weigh their manners, their indispositions, their sufficiency and their fortune: I think to the contrary, that Cicero and old Cato are indebted to their companions. For the purpose of this censure, I would rather have chosen the example of the younger Cato compared unto Phocion: for in this comparison there might be found a more likely disparity to the advantage of the ROMANS.

For Marcellus, Sylla, and Pompey, I fee well that their Exploits of War are more puft up, glorious and sumptuous, then those of the GREEKS which Plutarch compareth with them. But the most fair and vertuous actions are not always (no more then in Wars) the most famous. I oftentimes see the names of Captains drowned by the glory of other mens names of less merit: winness Labienus, Ventidius, Telesinus, and diversothers. And to take it from thence, If I were to complain me for the GREEK'S , might I fay , that much less is Camillus comparable unto Themisseles, the Gracehi unto Agus and Clements, Numa unto Lyeurgus, and Scipio unto Epaminen-das, which were also of his roll. But it is a solly to judge things on a sudden of so many men. When Plurarch compareth them, he doth therefore equall them. Who could more eloquently or confeionably note the disparities and differences? Doth he come to compare the Victories, the Exploits of Arms, the power of Armies led by Pompey, and his Triumphs, with those of Agefilans? I do not believe, faid he, that Xenophon himself it he were alive, although that they suffered him to write what he would to the advantage of Agefilam, durst put him in comparison. Doth he speak to compare Sylla with Lyfander ? There is no comparison, faid he, neither in number of Victories, nor in hazard of Battels: for Lyfander wan onely but two Battels by Sea, &c. That taketh away nothing from the ROMAN. To have fimply presented them to the GREEKS , he could have done them no injury, what disparity soever there might be : neither doth he weigh them also all together : in the great there is no preferency. He hath compared the pieces and circumstances one after another, and judgeth them severally. Wherefore if they would convince him of savour, they must unfold

some particular judgement, or to say in generall that he had failed to match such a GREEK with fuch a ROMAN: because there were others fitter to be compared, and of better report. So much objection. And to accuse Plutarch to have wanted judgement (he that hath always been very dif-creet in his Writings, as he protesteth at the beginning of his Book of fatall destiny) isto shew himfelfmad, and out of his wits. Those things that men judge to be small are not fo always, if they bebetter considered of : neither is his length fo far out of square and troublesome, neither is that out of the matter, which he intermingleth of the Poets, but is spoken to good purpose, and oftentimes upon good ground of advice in matters of great weight : whereof his Work shall make proof

for this point. There are other that have blamed the length of Plutarchs Discourses, also that he The length of hath mingled many light things, and that he delights to thrust in many Verses of Poets, without any Platarchi Difneceffity, fay they; judging that he did that to lofe no part of his memories, and so hath consuledly courses defenput all pieces together in his Work. But that which hath been spoken of before, answereth this ded.

wholoever will examine them without passion. But now let us leave these censors to think more advisedly hereaster what they speak, and come again to Platereb: who after his return to GREECE, gave himself more to his Book then he did before: and notwithstanding he was very old, he made an end of his Lives. And surthermore, continuing still the love he bare unto his Countrey, he imployed himself in divers Offices of the Common-wealth, whereof he maketh mention also in fundry places of his Morals; and especially in the Book where he instructeth those that deal in the Affairs of Estate. For he saith there thele words: I answer them that reprove me when they find me present in our Town, to see them measure, and tell brick, and tile, stones, sand, and line which they bring: that it is not for my measure, and ten orter, and the, stokes, and and in this treatife, Whether an old man should yet deal in the Affairs of Estate. Thou knowest (faid be, writing unto Euphanes) that there are many Pythiades, that is to fay, many terms of five years that I do exercise the Priethood of Apollo Py-THIAN : yet I think thou wouldest not say to me, Plutarch, thou hast sacrificed enough, thou haft made Processions enough, thou hast led many Dances; and now that thou art old and ancient, it nate move reoccusions chough , and abandon the Oracle , because of thy age. At the beginning of the eighth Queftion of the Sixth Book of his Difcourfe at the Table, he mentioneth his Office of being Mayor of the Town of CHERONEA. To conclude, even to the end of his life he thewed in his deeds, that which he excellently handled in his Writings: which is, that there is nothing letteth old men to ferre and profit their Common-wealth in divers forts of Government, whether it be with good words, with good counfell, with liberty and authority to fpeak boldly, and with grave respect, as the Poets say. For they are not the feet, nor the hands, nor all the strength of the body onely, which are the parts and good of the Common-wealth : but they are first of all and principally the Soul, and the beauties thereof: as Justice, Temperance, and Wildom; the which coming late to their perfection, it were to no purpole they should enjoy a House, Land, and all other Inheritances of his Citizens, and that it could receive no more any profit by them for the good of the Common-wealth, because of their long time, the which doth not so much deprive them of strength and ability to do fervice, as it doth increase them with sufficiency and knowledge of faculties requisite to command and govern. Furthermore Plutareh having lived always honourably even to old age, he died quietly among his children and friends in the City of CHERONEA, leaving in his Writings an immortall savour of his Name unto Posterity. Besides the honour his Citizens did him, there was a Statue let up for him by Ordinance of the People of ROME, in memory of his Vertues. Now furthermore, though time hath devoured some part of the Writings of this great man, and diminished fome other: nevertheless those which remain being a great number, have excellent use to this day among us. Howbeit, having met with fome tragments in Stobess, of fome Treaties which are not to be found any more, I thought it would not mislike the Reader to cull out some pieces to prefeat them unto him, to shut up all this Discourse. Wildom, faith he, (in the Book of profit which tuenledge of the time to come brirgeth) confliteth not in shew , but in affairs , before a man fetteth to his band: and sheweth how he should come before them, and receive them when they be offered him: for it confidereth the things to come. The body hath no eyes but before , the back feeth nothing at all: bur wisdom by help of memory, feeth even the things that are past and gone. It is the Secretary which always remaineth and abideth within, as Plato faith. It is the part or inftrument of the Soul which taketh hold of things past, keepeth them, and layeth them up fafe, making a circle, within the which that that is past joyneth with the thing prefent, and will not fuffer it to extend it self beyond compass, and to pass the bounds of Nature and knowledge. Of the Book against plessure. Pleasure undoeth the body, and daily maketh it tender by deliciousnels, the common ule whereof cutteth down the luftiness and confumeth the firength, fo that weakness and fickness do abound, and in youth they begin to wax old. Voluptuoulness is a Beaft that maketh men Slaves, but yet no favage Beaft: for it the did openly affail any body, there would foon be an end: but the is formuch more dangerous, because the hideth her ill courage, and taketh upon her the habit of good will. We must shun her therefore for two causes, the one, that she should not hurt us, the other, that the should not seduce us. Let us no more call voluptuousness honest pleasures, but rather acknowledge that they be troubles 2 fervices, and duties: and efteem the reft as shamefull and violent things, which by their diverfity flatter us, and in the mean time finely hurt us. Now our felves and affairs ought to be subject to the same Law that the brute Beasts are, to the end that when we have fatisfied our defire, we have no new mind to cover further, but that our moderate pleafures be contented when they have things necessary. Is there any man that will commend Traytours? Now pleafure is even such a one; for the betrayethall that depend upon Vertue. Doth any body eftern Hangmen much? See notwithflanding what it is to follow fenfuality, which tormenteth and renteth afunder all moderate things. Will any man commend avarice? Voluptuousness is as unsatiable as the love of Money. What pleafure can we take of a Beaft that destroyeth us by flattery ? I ask, why doeft thou not play the fool and knave in the presence of all men? To the contrary, thou slieft, and bearest reverence to thy self, abusing thy self in the night and darkness which cannot depose against thee. No man seeketh to hide him that doth well, not is afraid of the light that is round about him : but rather to the contrary , he would all the World were become a bright Sun , to give light to all the parts of the good Works he doth. But if he happen to commit any fault, he doth all his possible endeavour to hide it, and blameth his passion. Now let us take away the veil, and openly mule upon these pleasures. They make us drunk, even to lose our senses: they continually make knaves and drowfie lubbers to follow Harlots when they should labour: Enemies of mans life, neither caring for Father nor Mother , void of all reverence unto the Laws. In the Book that treaterb , how women flould be saught and learned. It is no eafy thing to hide this ignorance, faith Heraelitus: and much less then when he hath drunk more then ordinary. Plato saith also, that the thought is discovered by Wine: as much as to say, after a man hath drunk too much. For, faid he, I do not pronounce fentence against you, as a Thief passing by should fay . Deliver thy purfe , or thou art dead : but I do that as your Tutour , and one that hath a care of you: like unto the Phylician that comforteth his Patient from whom he would cut some member. and perswadeth him to be ruled. Cotis King of THRACIA was very cruell unto his Subjects; and when one of his familiars told him , That is called fury not Kingly Government. But so it is, anfwered the King, that this fury of mine maketh my Subjects wile and quiet. Of the Book against the Grength of the body. Doest thou think the strength of the body to be so great a happiness, that Strength thou wilt conclude that Nature which hath given more strength to Beasts then to men, should be Mother to them, and Step-mother to the other? Doeft thou think it is by reason of the massiveness or weight, or by the swiftness, or strength of the eyes? The true strength of men consistent in discourse of the soul, by means whereof he hunteth in the Forests, and taketh the Elephant in a fnare : he r deth Horses and breaketh them , he bringeth Oxen subject to the yoak , he beateth down Birds with bolts, and catcheth with angles Fish that lie hidden in the bottom of waters. There is his ftrength which is feen much better, when he confidereth at his ease, the roundness of the Earth, the breadth of the Elements, and the revolutions of the Stars. Such were the worthy Exercises of Hercules, and who had not rather be Ulyffes, then Polyphemus the CYCLOPIAN? Alfo when one spake much in commendation of a venturous and hardy man, as if he had been some brave Souldier : There is great difference, faid Aratus the SICYONIAN, betwirt esteeming vertue, and regarding life nothing. Of the Book of Divination. It is most apparent that from the beginning Ne- Necessity moceffiny invented and polished certain Arts, which she doth keep even till this present. It is she that there of arts, bath taught all things. For , is there any thing that necessity bath not thought of ? the hath brought forth the occupation of weaving, of building, the art of Physick, tilling of the ground, and all that belongs unto it. There be other crafts also found out, I connot tell by what pleasure: as Perfumers, Apothecaries , Cooks , and others that serve for ornaments of the body : also Painters. Again , there are Sciences which men feek, learn, and teach, because of the probable and apparent reason which they discover, and for the beauty of them: as Arithmetick, Geometry, and all others confifting in measures and proportions, then Astrologie. And yet though we contemn them, nevertheless because of their excellency, we are constrained in some fort to know them, faid Plato, Of the Treaty, That Love and Judgement are divers things. Some fay, that Love is the faculty of the Love! foul, which we call understanding: others, that it is a concupiscence or voluptuousness: others, that it is a madness: and there are that think it is, I cannot tell what divine agitation of the foul; and others that make it a god. This disputation hath made that some have judged, and rightly, that from the beginning, Love is a simple defire or lust: but if it exceed, it is fury. Also that friendship doth resemble it. If Love be despised, it begetteth melancholy : if it increase as wished, he that is possessed withall, bath a thousand conceipts and fantasticall imaginations, and doth imagine all the greatures and favours of Heaven and Earth. And this is the reason why the Poets fav. that Love is a Torch : and the Painters , Potters , and Statuaries do represent it in that estate. For that part of the fire which doth give light, is very pleafing, profitable and commodious: but that which burneth, bringeth nothing but trouble and forrow. Like as it is a good thing to reprove and admonish our When to add: friends, and fuch as belong unto us, whileft they be in their right wits, and capable of judgement monith our and understanding : so to the contrary , if they be light-headed and diffraught of their wits we do friends, not use then to reason and contest with them, but we rather do yeeld to that they say. So must we freely and lively reprove them, that commit a fault through choler or covetoulness: but as for Lovers, they must be excused because they be sick. And therefore from the beginning, it were the best way not to suffer Love to take root in them : if it do, repair then to the Altars of the gods that give remedy, as Plato faith, that is to fay, keep company with wife men. Drive this Beaft far from thee, before his teeth and nails do grow: if not, thou must fight with the evill when it is great and full grown, the which thou didft imbrace in thine infancy and youth. But which are these teeth and nails of Love? Suspition and Jealousie. Now some will say to me, that there is also I The reeth and know not what, a thing that draweth, and is pleasant. So had this famous Sphinz wings of divers nails of the colours, very pleafant to behold : for when he turned them to the beams of the Sun, they shined beast Love. like Gold : and when he was against the clouds, one would have faid it had been azure mingled with yellow and red , like the Rainbow in the Element. Love after the fame fort hath in it (I know not how) a gracious, gentle, and fair shew. But it destroyeth men, overthroweth houses, dissolveth marriages, and confoundeth great Captains, without propounding of hard Enigma's or Questions to be refolved: but himself being so taken that he connot be freed. For example. If one asked: What is that which at one instant loveth and hateth, flieth and pursueth, threatnesh and prayeth, evenatis that which as one material deveth, laugheth and weepeth with a breath? it is a knot which angretti and matteretti, tanctus and the Sphine had many things devited for pleasure, mingled one cannot eafily undo. Furthermore, the Sphine had many things devited for pleasure, mingled one cannot carry man. For though an old man go with a ftaff, yethe hath not three leet; and the little child is not a beaft with four feet, although he creep of all four, beloing his weak legs with his two hands. But there be no fuch Enigma's in the paffions of Lovers. They love and regs with his two names. The state of the st and kill themselves for the thing they love: they defire not to love, and yet will not leave to love; they repent them, and wax blind: they become wife, and yet cast themselves away: they will command, and yet yeeld themselves slaves. And therefore it is that such a passion is holden for a pure rage: as also Euripides doth confess it. Now Love is not begatten upon a sudden, nor a pure rage: as any Estrophics doint coincid at Leow Love is not organize upon a under, nor doth invade all the perion, a scholer doth; but it kindleth by little and little, as a little fire. Itiliped in foftly, and when it hath poffeffed the foul, it diflodgeth not easily; but we fee it fometimes lufty and fresh even in old men that have white hairs. If it cease, and begin to cool by succession of time, or that it be dead by some accident, it doth not altogether leave the foul, or the substance or time, or that it to use a system extension, it south not altogether have the rout, or the morante of his fire confumed; where the marks of his heat passed are to be seen, as if lightning had passed to his fire confumed; thorow there. As for the forrow past, and the choler after it is quenched, there is no spark left in the foul, but they perceive that the inflammation of the passion which made a great noise is quiet; but the bitings of Love, albeit the Beaft be gone, do not therefore lofe their venome, but the inward wounds do renew and refresh themselves again. To be short, no man knoweth what such a ward would not renew and renew and renew whence it flippeth into the heart. In the Book where he disputeth for beauty. Are not men compounded of body and soul? Is the one enough for us with out the other? How could that be? For if the body were not governed by the foul, it would not live, and the foul had need of a place to be kept and lodged in. Since then both the one and the other are adorned with gifts proper unto them; the foul with justice, temperance, and wildom: and the body with force, beauty and health: were it not to be wondered at, if one despifed that which concerneth the body, and that he made no reckoning but of the goods of the foul? Corporation and the foul, which make a prefent of the gift to the body. For when the full beauty is a work of the sour, which makes a person of the girt, and foul is gone, there remaines nothing good in the body. The firength, the colour, the fight, and the voice do vanish. To conclude, the body being abandoned of his ancient inhabitant, there is no thing left that is amiable. Thoutherefore that acculeft Beauty, unawares thou fpeakeft outrage to the foul, which is cause of this beauty. Aristotle to one that asked him, why a man did love fair things, answered : It is for a blind man to ask such a question. Diogenes called fair Curtizans, Queens, because many do execute that which they command. Of the Book against Nobility. What do we think that Nobility is, but Riches gathered together by Ancestors, or some Honour anamed unto long time before? whereof the one nor the other proceedeth not of our Will : but the one cometh by unconstant Fortune, the other proceedeth from the disorders of the World. So then this proud name of Nobility floweth from two strange springs. Now Riches maketh not those that are born like unto them: but Vertue proceeding from the lincere habitude of the Spirit, is planted in the Race of the Vertuous, and doth make them truly noble. In this is true Nobility, to wit; the conformity unto vertuous manners. But I pray you, King Midus Riches, were they more richthen the Foverty of Arifidat? although he left not wherewithall to defray his charges of Funerall. To the contrary, King Mida. Tomb passed for magnificence all the Riches of the World: but Nobility the contrary, King Mida. Tomb passed for magnificence all the Riches of the World: but Nobility is not inclosed in Gold nor Silver. Vice is rightly compared unto fire: for when either the one or the other wanted nurture, it goeth out. But the balenels of the Race of Socrates the Philosopher, the Son of an Image-graver, and of a Midwife, is it not more noble then the glory of Sar-puer, the sou of an among grant, and think Aerxes more noble then Cyngynus, who had one of his hands cut off fighting for his Countrey: fince the other fled to fave his life, being a King environed with coward lines. Of the Treaty against riches. Hunger gave never any man cause to be an adulterer: nor hath want of Money made any man diffolute. Poverty is a kind of temperance, and need may be called a furnmary observation of the Laws, Arcesilans saith, poverty was rude, no less then the sile of ITHACA; but surthermore, a good nurse for children; because it did use them to frugality and about the sile of the flinence: and at one word, it is the healthfull School of Vertue. Thus have you some fragments of our Philosopher, of the which, as of the rest of his works, we desire that all may learn to

THE LIFE OF SENECA.

Ann. Mund. 3967.

A knowledge that doth many errors flie A life relisting vices poisoned breath: A death, in death, that conquer'd death by death, O Seneca, are fruits of thy Philosophy.

PAIN is divided by the Geographers into three severall parts, of the which one of them abutting upon the Straights of GIBRALTAR and the Mediterrane Sea , called by Strabo TURDITANIA, was in old time the beft inhabited. And albeit he doth confine it into two thousand furlongs in compass, yet he faith that in his time they made account of two hundred Towns within that circuit, which at this day is called ANDALYSIA having taken the name of the VANDALS, which have dwelt there fince the ruine of the ROMAN Empire. In this part of SPAIN was (and yet is) fituated upon the River called of the Ancients Bætis, and at this day Guadalquibir, (that is to fay, the great River, by reason of his long course) the City of CORDUBE, or CORDOVE, which was in old time one of the most famous Cities of SPAIN, built by Marcellus, and inhabited with noble ROMANS, 28 Plinie and Strabo do witness. This place amongst others was a feed-plot or gar- The Family the ROMANS, as Plume and Strato do witness. This place amongst outers was a recurption of gard and Race of den of good spirits, and men given to study. Among other honourable Families of that time, was Seneca. that of the Anneans, which befides their Nobility loved Learning, specially since the Father of Seneca, whose life now we write. He was a simple Gentleman bearing no charge in the Common- seneca's Father wealth, for that he had no fpirit in him to imbrace fuch burdens, and gave himself most to Learning, although otherwise he left not his Sword, being a Knight as many other PATRICIANS in the Province where he was. With his Arms he joyned the Profession of Learning, but specially of Eloquence, in the which he excelled the most in his time. He married a Lady called Elbia, of whom he had three Sons, the eldest bearing the name of the Father, to wit, Lucius Annaus Seneca. The fecond , Annam Metarm , afterwards called Julius Gallio. The third , Annam Mella, Father of Lucan the Poet. The Father was very carefull to have his Children well taught and brought up, but the eldeft especially, who with time gave himself wholly unto Philosophy. For Gallia, befides his Learning, he was raifed up to some publick Dignities at Rome. Mella on the other fide, he cared not for advancement, and therein he followed his Father, as we will shew hereaster more at large. Seneca, of whom we have presently to speak, was born as it should seem, In what time a little before the death of Augustus Cofor. For himself writeth in the hundred and ninth Epistle Scarca was unto Lucilline, that he was a young man when by the commandment of Tiberius the Ceremonies bo.n.

of the Strangers Religions were driven out of Roma , the which were lim Tacism in the lecond or the strangers actigions were adopted in the fifth tear of Tiberim. But of this we will freak more hereafter, treating of the Writings of Seneces. Furthermore, the occasion why himself and more nereaster, treating of the variable of the Reign of his Brethren came out of Spain to Rome, was this. About the tenth year of the Reign of uis Dreturen cause out of State of the Dominion of Rose, by Tiberim Empire, matters began to be troublelome in divers parts of the Dominion of Rose, by reason of the cruelties and infolencies of this Prince : who having about him Sejanne, and some other dangerous Counfellours, he shewed his disposition more then before. The fickness of the head flowuangerous Countenours, a section of that the Provinces were left without Governours, or elfe were eth into all the principall members: fo that the Provinces were left without Governours, or elfe were etti into au the principan incharacter followed great alterations. SPAIN amongst others, in many tyrannized by Prattors: whereupon followed great alterations. places lived as they lifted: it was managed at that time by Exactors, which caused People to rebell places lived as may inited. It chanced amongst others, that L. Pife Prator, was killed by a Ter-MESTAN, because he carried himself tyrannously amongst the People. This Termestan being MESTAN, Decause or carried minutes, samples of the state of the caught by the back, and cruelly tortured, he shewed himself to front notwithstanding, that they could not possibly make him contels any of his associates. But being quickly dispatched by the hands of the Hangman, who would have put him to a new torture, he knocked his head against a stone with fuch force, that he died prefently in the Field. Shortly after the Cities began to be weary of their yoak, and Corpove specially among others, which being of the principallest and of great imyoas, and Cordove specially among outsile, which bong or the pennsparent and of great importance, an Army was fent thither under the conduct of Cnew Domitsia Anobarban, who having fubdued Cordove, took amongst others Seneca, his two Brethren, and Lucan his Nephew, their Father being dead some years before. Domitim knowing what men they were, he set them at liberry, and did fo much that he perferaded them to leave SPAIN and go to ROME, 25 well to continue and to advance their studies well begun, as to be known and honoured with publick Office. Now the that of Spain was fuch at that time, that Senece and his were easily perswaded and won by him that had Authority over them, and at the last they went into ITALY. Some think that Anneus Making Changing over them, and at the law they man and the privately, and that made no account of the honour and vanity of the World. For his Son Lucan, he was brought very young His Masters at after his two Uncles, who did hear at Rome Pampenisu Maruidus, Julius Higinus, Cossius and Afinist Gallus in Rhetorick : and in Philosophy, Socio Alexandrinus, and Photisus a Stoick, very famous. Under which they all profited, and Seneca specially, who joyning to the gravity of the Doctrine of the Stoicks, a compendious and fententious speech, in short time made himself to

Now having remained a space shur up in Schools, or hidden in the company of some learned men, whom he hearkened unto, and familiarly frequented, he was put forward at the beginning of the Empire of Caligula, by Cneus Domitius (who had married Agrippina the Daughter of Germanicus, and little Daughter of Tiberiai, of whom Nero was born, nine Moneths before the death of Tiberius) and began to thew himfelf openly, pleading before the Senate with great grace; for from that time forth he was eftermed for one of the wifert and most eloquent men of Rome. By means whereof his credit increased from day to day. But as pricks be hidden under Roses, and where men think to win Honour, oftentimes they get repulse and contempt: the revolution of mens where men think to win Honour, oftentimes they get repulse and contempt: the revolution of mens Affairs flourishing, yet marvellous brittle and subject to fall: So Senece proved that his eloquence profited others more then himfelf: and that as fometimes it is a wifer part to keep the Sword in the scaberd, then in the hand, even so

Seneca wife

The Emperour Caligula was a Prince that cared little for Liberall Sciences, yet he was very curious nience.

110 Emperour Cangula was a runte mate take mine of Landau and Cheened, among others: [pecially of Art of tenner of Arts. if sometime he disposed himself to speak against any man, the words and whole sentences did man create in his mouth, with such an accent and gesture, that they heard him and knew him afar off, and fometimes he threatned men with the force of his tongue. This quickness and vain eloquence of his, made him (besides that he had an ill shaped head) wonderfull presumptions. For there was never a learned man and eloquent in all the ROMAN Empire, but he would prefer himself before him. And those that directly or indirectly went about to cross him, they put themselves in manifest danger: winess that which happened to the Oratour Demirius Afer, and unto Sencea. Caligula bearing ill will a long time unto Domitius for fome light fpight he had unto him, Domitius was accused before the Senate: where Caligula made a long Oration written, and therein laid open all his fufficiency, to shew himself better able then Domitims, efteemed one of the best spoken men at that time. Now his purpose was to put Domitius to death, if he had studied to an fwer eloquently. But Domitias eafly discovering this dangerous resolution, made no reply, nor excused himself, but said he was aftonied at the Oration of the Emperour : and seining that the babling of Caligula had ravished him, he made a brief repitition, as if he had come thinker to hearken. Then having magnified his Discourses, and being commanded to defend himself, he to nearken, and to crave grace, and kneeling down belought Caligula, being more atrait of his word then of his hand. Caligula wonderfull joyfull of this honour, and thinking to be Eloquence it self, received Domisius into grace. Senses taking no heed otherwise to that manter, and having at that time the free spirit of the Stoicks, within few days after he fell almost into the like perill or greater danger then Domisius: he knew that Caligula did bear him ill will, and did also speak evil of him amongst his friends: and did compare him in his talk to gravell or fand without lime, as if he would have faid, that there was neither good band or consequence in Seneca's Discourse. And to conclude, that he was but a jungler. But Seneca being carried away with the glory he had won , which pleased him well , continued notwithstanding to be in the Senate: Infomuch that one day having a Cause to plead before Calignia, he behaved himself with Scneca indanfuch a grace and vehemency, that all that heard him efteemed him more then they did before, Call- gered by reagula onely excepted: who being vexed, and as it were pierced through with eloquent words of Semeta, (he having in the mean time let fall no word to offend Caligula, but went on roundly with well fooken. his matter) he was even at the point to put him to death, and then had executed his thought, had it not been for a woman he kept, who perswaded him not to do it, assuring him that Seneca had a disease that would soon dispatch him out of the World. But after that, Seneca forbare, knowing with whom he had to deal. And foon after Caligula being flain by Chavea, and Julies Sabinus his Uncle (Son of Drufus and of Livia) called Claudius, was chosen Emperour, at the beginning Seneca came again into his former credit and fame, and continued it for fome years; but at the laft he was banished Rome for this cause. Clanding was a Prince of small judgement, and carried by Screen banished certain Minions and Parafites of the Court, and by his Wife Messalina, one of the most shamelels from Rome: women that ever was. This woman wholly pofferfing Claudius, caused men and women of all quafires to be put to death and banished, as she thought good : and those above all others that went about to hinder the course of her strange waies. Among others the did bear Julia the Daughter of Germanicus ill will (as Dion reportest) because Julia did not regard nor flatter her. Furthermore Julia was a very fair Lady, which made Meffalina jealous, who by little and little, found the means to accuse this Lady of many crimes, and specially of adultery: and made her be banished, then put to death immediatly after. Seneca was carried away with this tempest, as culpable of the faults pretended against Julia. Some think that Julia is this Agrippina Mother of Nero, whom Claudis married after the death of Moffalina, and that the was banished from the Court but for a time onely. The which is very likely, as also Cornelius Tacitus feemeth to incline to that opinion. But Scarca bold for Seneca, it is not onely in one place, but in many, that Dion and others do accuse him, that he with Agrippina. had been somewhat bold with Agrippina, as if the credit he had in the House of the late deceased Chens Domitius, had given him the boldness to defile the bed of his Benefactor, dead a little before Tiberius. Furthermore, he was banished into the Isle of Corse, where he remained about banishment two years: during which time he earnestly disposed himself to the study of Philosophy, with singular contentment and quietness of mind, as may be gathered out of the goodly Discourse he wrote, and fent unto his Mother Helbia, who did bardly bear this banishment of his. But he did comfort her, and by lively Reasons shewed her, that his entertainment was not grievous unto him. but that Philosophy had strengthened him after an excellent fashion, against all the affaults of Fortune. Whileft he was in this profitable solitarines, Mesalina continued in her wantonness with fuch an impudent and hot fury, that without the testimony of so many worthy Historians. it were impossible to believe that the wife of an Emperour durst once have thought to have committed the thousand part of the villanies unto the which she had given her felf over to the fight and knowledge of all the World. Infomuch as in the end in the day time, within Rome, in Meffalina impresence of many persons of quality, and in the sight of all the People, Claudius being no fur-pudently went ther off then Hostia, the married with great pump an Adulterer called Silling, a Gentleman of ROME, with all accustomed Ceremonies and Solemnicies. She made a Feast, and held Sillius for her Husband. Tacitus in his Annals reporteth these things at large. Now though Claudius was fo foolish before, and then too, that he perceived not that which all others faw so openly : in the end being wakened by Narcifus one of his Minions, he put Sillius to death, and fome others culvable of this strange excess. And for Mesalina, the had almost comeagain into grace, but Mesalina pur in the end she was killed by the commandment of Narcisus. After Mesalina was executed to death. the three Minions of Claudius, to wit, Narcifus, Califus, and Pallas, they layed their heads together to give their Master a Wife. But in the end Pallas, that pleaded for Agrippina the Widow of Cneus Domitius, little Daughter of Tiberius, the Daughter of Germanicus, and Neece of Claudius, carried it from them; the reasons he propounded had so much more sorce, being accompanied with dainty fugred words : who under the colour of a Kinswoman , came often to visit her Uncle, and the flattered him to bravely, that the being preferred before others, and not yet married, the did already use the authority and power of a Wife. And out of hand, immediatly after the Marriage was folemnized with her Uncle Claudius , the advanced Domitius Nero her Son . and the Son of Cneus Domitius. Furthermore by her practifes, Ollawia the Daughter of Claudiss, and of Messalina, bethrothed unto Sillanus, was promised and afterwards given unto Nerofor ried to Claudihis Wife. Who being yet very young when his Mother married Gland us (and but eleven years us the Empeold onely) it was in question to get him a good Master and Tutor to teach him his Book betimes, rour, and Oda and to train him up in Affairs of Estate. Agrippina, a woman of a m. vellous spirit, and that via betrothed plotted great things, as the effect shewed afterwards, as Tacitus hath wife noted : the resolved to have Seneca called back again, and immediatly obtained his grace of the Camperson. She did this to divers ends, the one was to have a man of great authority and bringing up about her Son, to the end to maintain Nero under the shadow of so great an appearance, entill the time of his advancement were come. The other, to make the remembrance of Meffaliza the more odious, who had been the cause of the banishment of Seneca to put back Britamnicus, the Son of her, and Brother of Ottavia, and by that means to have men at her commandment, little affected unto Claudins. So then Agripping over-ruling Claudius at her pleasure, she did not onely obtain the repeal,

but also the Pratorship for Seneca, whom they sent for quickly, and he returned to ROME with great

Afterwards being called into the Palace of the Emperour, Domitius Nero is given him in charge, with great promifes of Agripping, who had two vices common to fuch persons. The one was, that she was set on fire with extream covetoulness to get Money, under colour that she layed a foundation in store to help to maintain her Estate. The other, that the gave largely unto those whom the knew meet for the advancement of her Son, whom the would raife up to be Emperous whatfoever it coft her , yea were it her own life : as appeared by her answer to a wife man, whom the had asked what should become of the future Greatnels of her Son Nero. For that he having answered her, that he might be Emperour, but it should be to her undoing: Let me die then, faid she, so he may reign. Tacirus writeth that Agrippina thought the People would rejoyce at the return of Sensea, because of the great same of his Knowledge: and also procured this good, to the end that the infancy of Domitius might grow untill his adoletcency under fuch a Mafter, and she to use his counsell, to attain to the greatnels of command which the hoped for. Seneea, inflead of continuing in his foliarinefs, and not remembring that

Who entreth Tyrants House, doth become

A Slave , though he thither a Freeman come. He to the contrary, thinking he had found the means to shew the effects of a Philolopher (the wit of man, yea of the wifeft, is fo finared in darknels upon darknels, when there is question of the troubles of this life) went and engaged himself in the service of Agrippina. And although for a time he bridled the youth of Nero, and did withftand certain diforders, yet in the end he was conftrained to leave all, and suffer the fierce stream to run, having defired (but too late) solitarines: and with lefs Goods and Honours of the World, more Liberry, and quietness of mind. Now, as he himself knew very well, and did excellently teach it unto others, that so as Megrims and pains in the head are not healed by a Crown or Royall Band, neither to the contrary, is good health, nor the good flate of a man loft, though he be not a great Lord: fo this greatnels in the which he faw himlest highly lift up in a short time, did nothing else but increase his cares, wherewith he found him fels bound, as with strong chains to the end of his life. And though he did shake them, and at times had proved to break them, yet he could not possibly unloose them: and in the end there was no way but he must perish under the weight Of maffie chains, that of no iron were, But fuch as hamefaftnefs did make him bear.

New trastable It is true, that at the first his Charge and Government seemed light unto him. For New was a young Prince of great hope, and in youth he shewed himself gentle, tractable, obeying his Schoolmafters inftructions, who delighted to manure this Plant, hoping all the World should have joy of him. But as the Emperours that were before, even in their young age, had made some shew of that which might be expected of them in time to come: Somes also perceived through the goodly apparence of his Scholar, some part of his wild, naughty, and untoward nature, which he thewed within tew years after. Allo Caesu Domitius his Father, as some came to gratifichim for that Agrippina his Wife had brought him a Son: he holding down his head, answered, that they should not think that of him and of fuch a woman should be born an infant, but to the ruine and confusion of the Empire. This Prediction was not noted, but when Agripping her felf felt by the loss of her life, what a child she had brought into the World, and advanced by so many strange practites, and by the degrees of incest, of bloud, and filthings, unto the Imperial Dignity. Now whilet Seneces imployed himself to polish the spirit of Nero, and sought to print in his heart the love of Vertue, Agrippina carefull of the worldly greatness of her Son, the followed her purpose cumningly helping her felf (asmuch as the thought fit, to ferve her turn) with the counted of Senece, whom she acquainted not but with the least part of the corruption of her intentions; for she being a cruell woman, and that never received those into favour whom she hated, caused Lolia Paulina to be put to death, that had reasoned against her for the marriage of Claudiss. "She caused Calcraell woman. purnia to be banished out of ITALY. And having through Pallas credit, who privatly governed her , and allo kept her , made her Son Afro to be adopted , who was preferred before Britanniem, the right Succeffor unto the Empire: to the end she would have her Power and Authority to be known to the Friends and Allies of the Empire, the caused a number of Souldiers of the old Bands and People to be carried to the place where the was born, a Town of the UBIANS, at this day his Train went the same time before Agrippina (who was set upon a scassold joyning unto that MANS. See the plant of the people directly the first of the plant of the people of the plant. and a fum of money given to every fouldier. Allo Nero himfelf paffing to go to the Plays and a number of circes, went apparelled with an Imperiall Robe, and Britannicus as he was wont : who remembring fo many outrages as they had done unto him, could not contain but must shew some discontenuent. And this served Agripping her intention; for she prevailed so much with Clau-uncommunities, that the procured him to banish or put to death all the Governors of his son Britannicat. And worse yet: he committed him unto men suborned by Agrippina; who passing surther vet, discharged Lucius Geta of his Captainship of the Guard, Rufus Crispinus, servants of the house of Messalina, and placed in their rooms , Burrus Afranius, a man greatly esteemed for a Warriour, but who knew well enough by whole favour he was advanced. Such was the boldness of this Agrippina, a great Lady in truth (for the was the Daughter, Sifter, Wife, and Mother of an Emperour) but of a spirit compounded of all forts of mischiefs. We have touched these things passing by, upon the occasion of Seneca: who being occupied about his Pupil, was confirained to be partaker of many counfells, of the which he understood not the depth always. But to it is, that Agrippina ferved her turn much by his authority, to advance her business: the seneraunderfo it is, that Agrippina terved ner tuli most by the address of the bought of it too late. Now flood nor the which Seneca perceived well, but he could not remedy it, for he thought of it too late. Now depth of Awhich serves patterned with, one admonitions of his mafter were bars to keep him in order, yet grippinats the corruptions of that time, and the working of his mother alfo, began by little and little to differ appear in him : fo that by time he made it manifest, that the good instructions had beaten his ears a little, and troubled his brain somewhat: but that evil had taken too deep root in his heart,

Furthermore, whilft Nero remained to as under the rod, openly there could be noted in Agrippina nothing but feverity and gravity, no infolencies in her houle, otherwise then she thought might ferre for the advancement of her affairs: for then, her felf, as alfo all her train, gave themfelves over to all diffolution. Now after she had advanced a part of her intentions, Nero being sixteen years old, married Octavia the daughter of Claudiu: and to fhew that he had learned under Seneca, he pleaded many causes of importance unto the Senate, with the praise of all men, Immediately after, a matter happened, that compelled Agrippina to look advisedly unto her affairs, Claudius having drunk well at a feaff, let thele words escape bim, that his deftiny was first to endure all the mischiefs of his Wives, and afterwards to punish them. She being afraid to be prevented, determined to make hafte, after she had first destroyed Lepida her Cousin-German, Lepida made who wan the heart of Nero by her kindness and liberality. These troubles of Agrippina gave away.

But in these firs Claudius was poi-foned by a Woman, an Eunuch of his, and his Physician, practiced of long time by Agrippina, who Emperor poyhaving didained Britannicus and his fifters a long time, fuddenly the Gates of the Palace were opened, foned by the and Mero accompanied with Buryus presented himself to the souldiers PRETORIANS, of whom procurement of being faluted Emperour, he was confirmed by decree of the Senate, and afterwards allowed by his wife Agrip; the Provinces. Then Nero made divers Orations penned by Semeca, who besides the content- pina.

ment he had of the high dignity of his Pupill, wrote a pleasant Discourse upon the death of Claudist, and did intitle it, Apocolokynthosis, that is to say, immortality gotten by Musstrooms, because the meat was sprinkled all over with Mussirooms, whereof Claudius was poysoned. The which Nero afterwards called the meat of the gods, feeing that by that means his Father in law was scraped out of the World, and made one of the gods after the fashion of the Ro-MANS. Also Gallio Seneca's brother gave Clauding a mock, saying that he was drawn up to heaven with a hook, slenting at the custom in practise at that time, to draw the bodies of malefactors put to death in prilon, with an iron hook into the River. Such was the end of Claudins, rewarded for his incest, and for the injury he did unto his son Britannicus, to advance a fon-in-law, for to pleafe an ambitious woman, to wit, Agrippina. Nero being thus raifed up, his

Seneca with a pleasant and comely fashion taught this young Prince eloquence, re's good. They did carefully help one another, and often conferred together what means they should use to make Nero love Vertue, whereof he feemed to have great beginnings. To hold him in more eafily, they let him have his own will in exercises and honest pleasures, and lest him to his disposition to do as he thought good. This young man from his infancy used his wit, which was quick to divers things, peradventure better for a man of fome other quality, to wit: to grave, to paint, to fing, to play on the Cithern, to ride horses, and to make verses. That a Prince have all the parts in him, and be furnished with others, is not a thing in it self to be blamed, so that the prin-

the prairies of a Prince: He was a good player at Tenorcellin other nis, a cunning Workman, a brave Fencer, a fine Dancer, a great Talker: My fair friend, thou doeft as if one being about to speak of a man and his contentment, came to tell us that he handleth neglect act the his feet and his hands finely, and that he hath fine shooes on, and weareth his hat gallantly; and thou forgest bodies without a foul, and men without vocation, and vocations ridiculous. laighearing one call the King of Persia, a great King: Why, faid he, is he greater then my felf, unless it be that he is juster then I am? Nothing furely maketh Kings and Princes truely great Justice onely but justice. Other things how exact foever they are found, they shall oftentimes meet with maketh Princes more excellent in a poor crafts mans hand, hidden amongst the refuse of the people. The Prince therefore is not desirous of true honour, nor a man that deserveth praise, that is carefull to cloub his body fumptuously, and that glorieth to be a Painter, a Graver, a cunning Workman, a Singer, a player at Tennis, a Hunter, a Dancer, and that his house be richly furnished with houshold ftuff, and himself daintily served: and all this while he giveth no order for his speech, his company, and conversation, that therein he be Graver and Wiser then a base and common person. making no account to have the Palace of his Soul Royally apparelled and fet forth, as appertain-A Prince given eth to a royall magnificence. But how can a Prince be great, what power of authority foever he

to bife things have, if he be given to vile things, unworthy of his true greatness? and worse then that, if he cannot be great joyn vice unto these ridiculous things in him? Away with this trash, and take vertue from a great man in the world, you shall see him little in all other things. Little in his gifts and presents : because he will not, or knoweth not how to dispose them. Little in pains, because of his delicatenels: little towards God, because of his superstition: little unto the good, because of his envy: little unto men, because of his cowardliness: little among women, because he is subject unto voluptyousnels. For like as evil Workmen, which set up little statues upon great and large bases, do by measure shew the smallness of their statues: even so when Fortune lifterh up to high estate a man of a weak and little heart, where he is to be seen of all the world; and in the place of the Robe and Staff of Justice, he is seen apparelled like a crasts man, or an enterlude player: she doth discover, descry, and dishonour him, making it appear how he recleth and stumblesh for his lightness. Let this be spoken to the purpose of Nero's pastimes, who shortly after less all fuch Comedies, to play terrible Tragedies. And for his small pleasures, although at the first Burrus and Seneca were wary that this young Prince lived modeftly enough: yet we must confefs that fometime they gave him liberty to entertain women, which the eftate of his Court of ROME did offer him at pleasure. But that which most troubled them, was the boldness of A. The motioncy grippina: who being fet on fire with all the passions that may be found in a wicked Governof Agripina a grippina: ment , had near about her Palace an arrogant man, and that having forgotten with what conand Seneca's dition he came to mount so high, braved all the World, and Mero himself: who notwiththanding his youth, did very unpatiently bear the infolency of this Minion. And yet he bare it, because he would not anger his Mether, to whom he spared no reverence, honour, and kindness amongst his Lords : also be called her his good Mother , even to give this name otherwhile for a watch-word unto the Captain. In these beginnings Nero made many goodly and well penned Orations, after the manner of Seneca, who had a gentle spirit, and meet for the ears of the time. These exercises fashioned Nero, kept under his wild nature, and framed it to

Mere governed the affairs of effate: in such fort, that the first five years of his Empire, he was so finely handwell inhis fust led by Seneca, seconded with Burrus, that the affairs of Peace and War prospered, every man having great hope of Nero, who shewed himself lowly, and given to vertue. Seneca reporteth wonders in his books he did dedicate unto him, where he treated of clemency, fingularly of this gentleness of his. For at the beginning of the second book he saith, that Burrus desirous to hang two Thieves, fued to the Emperour to fet to his hand, against whom, and for what causes this execution should be done. This being put off divers times, Burrus sollicited the dispatch, and being angry, prefented the paper unto Nero: who with a discontented countenance, and doing it as against his will, he cryed out : By my will, I would I could neither write nor read. See to what end the instructions of Seneca served : where I will tell you another story, although it chanced a long time after the first, to shew the credit of the Master towards his Scholar. Nero having made a pavillion with eight panes wonderfull sumptuous, Senica told him: Thou hast shewed thy self in this pavillion that thou art poor : For if thou lose it , thou shalt never have the like again. As it came to pass: for the ship wherein his pavillion was, was cast a way; and Nero remembring Seneca's words, did bear the loss of it more patiently. Furthermore Senec. accompanied Nero in the affemblies of Councill, and oftentimes told him in the field what he should do, according to the occurrences: and in divers Orations he procured that Nero made protestation of his gentleness before the Senate. The which turned to the praise of Seneca, in such fort notwithstanding that the people perceived, and rejoyced at it. So they report that the Emperour Trajan was wont to say, that all the other Princes were far from the first five years of the Em-Pire of Nero: as Tacitus and others do testifie. In the mean time Nero shewed himself very liberal unto Seneca, and did esteem him as much, or more, then any man in ROME at that time: for he made him a prefent of great fums of money, unto three thousand Sestertium, which some think do amount unto seven millions and fifty thousand Crowns; of the which, part of it yielded him great profit at usury: the other part was bestowed upon sumptuous Gardens, houses of pleasure, lands and poffettions far off and near ROME: and furthermore a Palace in the City, full of all forts of precious moveables. For all this Seneca waxed nothing the prouder, but fearing fortune, and remembring his old state and condition, fought to keep himself upright in the middest of the great Seneca in procombats which were like to come, having upon his arms the unconstant youth of Nero, the which sperity forgetcompany which was the state of the control of the other fide, the ambition of Agrippina to fight withall think of adand beat down: this woman being of such a spirit, that she could tarry in no place, but set her versity, felf and others on work. But this credit of Burrus and Seneca, and their great riches alfo, especially of Seneca, made them to be envied of many, that did blame and accuse them openly. Whereany of servers, maximum popoled the gravity of his manners, and fought by divers writings to firengthen himfelf more and more: as some of his works, especially the discourse of a happy life, seemeth to be done by him during these alarms.

Now the beginning of these griefs of Seneca, came partly for that he perceived Nero's mind so corrupted, that he began to be very diffolute : and partly also for that he discovered that Agrippina and her Minions would fee upon him and Burrus also, which with time would bring them into many dangers. And though for his own part he was relolute against all accidents, nevertheless the charge and care he had of the affairs of the Empire, and the love which he bare unto Were his Scholar, troubled him exceedingly. Nevertheless as hope entertaineth us in all dangers, attending better, he determined to keep himself upright as long as he could possible, and to expect some other issue in the affairs. Nero was enamoured on a bond-woman called Atte, which his familiars did endure, alledging they must suffer one evil, for fear a worse should happen: and that so long as he should satisfie himself with her , he should not run after the Ladies of An inconveni-ROME. But Agripping that could not bear with this infolency, began to take up her Son ence fufficied roundly, thinking the could by her magistrality remedy this well enough. To the contrary, this chief. was to kindle the fire, and to embrace it altogether in this Girl. Nero being waxen great, and counselled by Otho and Claudius Senecio, who made the messages of Love, he southed at these reprehensions, and began to despise his mother: who on the sudden came to change her subtilties. And she had not been so sharp before in rebuking, but she was now as gentle in yielding, and offered her closet to her fon for the accomplishing of his desires. This sudden change made Nero's mothet Nero and his Minions think much of it, infomuch as they prayed him to beware of the deceits unconfiant. of this woman, that practifed in her heart some villany, Nero countermining her, presenteth his mother with many rich jewells and apparel of great price. But she being suspicious as could be possible, gave them injurious words that brought them. Wherewith Nero being offended, and knowing that Pallas was the chief counsellor of Agrippina, took his offices from him, which were committed to him by the Emperor Claudius. Agrippina began then to diminish in reputation, and to see off the hooks: and coming to Nero himself, threatned him to take his Empire from him, and Agripina to establish Britannicus, the lawfull successor of Claudius; and hereupon detested in express tearms threatner the wickedness she had committed, to bring up a son that was so unthankfull unto her: adding Nero. moreover, that the would go find out the Armies with Britannicus, fo long as they could, the on the other side, this baggage fellow Burrus, and this banished pedanticall companion Seneca (so did she qualifie him) barking after the government of the world. These threatnings were accompanied with such strange countenances and imprecations, that they troubled Nero; besides that Britannicus came now to be fourteen years old : and that one day playing, he could fay aloud before Were himfelf. that they had taken his Empire from him. Shortly after Britannicus was poyloned, and died fud Britannicus dealy, to the great aftonishment of Agrippina and of Ollavia also. Afterwards, Nero desisted poyloned. to converse so privately with his mother as he did at other times; and began to give ear unto them that would fet them further at odds: fo that a certain fool, called Paris, having told Nero one night that Agrippina conspired against him, he was resolved to make his mother to be put to death; Nero purpoand to take from Burrus the charge of Captain of the Guards. But Seneca kept him from that, feth to put his and after some reasons passed between them, Burrus being sent for, to put Nero by his choler, he mother to befought him to let him have the charge of this business, affuring him that he would put A- death. grippine to death, if the were convinced of any villany. Notwithflanding that every body thould be heard speak in their defence, and above all, a mother: adding also that the accusers wete not present, and that there was but one accuser suspected. And that he could not justifie, that such an important deliberation should be made by night, and at the Table: and that all that would shew his rashness and folly more then any other thing. Nero being somewhat pacified they tarried till day, that they might go to the mother, to know how these accusations fell out. Burrus was there by express Commission with Sinesa, and some others, to mark what should be faid. But Agrippina could so well justifie her felf, that her accusers were punished: for one of them was put to death, and the rest banished. From that time forward Nero began to run rior, as is described by Suetonius, Tacitus and Dion. But the beginning of new and horrible mileries (the other that went before being but light in respect of them) was the falling in love with Sabina Popaa, the Wife of Otho, who had taken her away from her first Nero fallets husband Rufus Crispinus, a Knight of Rome. Nero did the like unto this Otho, and took in love with from him this Minx that knew the tricks of the occupation. She having gained Nero in a little Sabina Poport pace, prevailed so much with him, that he determined to put his mother Agrippina to death.

Nero waxeth

Who hearing of the ill will her Son did bear her, fought by all means to get into his fa-Who nearing of the in win her son and ocal had, rought by an incans to get into his ba-your again; even to prefent her felf fo fhamefully unto him, that I shame to be the reporter of your again: even to present that the state of the state o commanded Anicers Generall of the Galleys of MISENE, to fee her drowned: the which was commanues Anteres Central of the Agrippina for that time eleaped being burt, and got to a house of pleafure of hers. Agro hearing thele news, more dead then alive, thinking he was undone, fent prefently for Burrus and States to have their advice : and we cannot tell faith Taciem) whether they were of counfell and privy to this fact, or not. Both of them therefore were a great while with about they were a counter and party at the land they flould lose time, if they flould go about to diffwade putting Agrip and spake not a word, being afraid they should lose time, if they should go about to dissuade and space not a word, only assault of space to the space of the space come, that Nero must needs die, it Agroppina were not prevented. Sencea, who until this prefent time was ever ready to speak, looked upon Burrus, as to know of him if he thought good to command the Men of War to do this murther. Burrus answered, that the Presorian souldiers were to affectioned to the house of the Cefars, and did to much reverence the memory of Germanicm, that they would never enterprife any thing against the life of his children; and that Anicesus was to perform his promife, Who without any further thought, demanded and excepted the Committion, which was forthwith executed, and Agrippina put to death in her house, where the thrusting out her body to the Centener, who took his fword in his hand to kill her, she crych out: Ventrem feri, destring that the womb which had born such a fruit as Nero, should be first stricken, and run through. Nero defiled with this execrable murther, added thereto other infinite abominations, especially the putting away and doing his Wife Octavia to death, a vertuous Princes, and that deserved better. Now this is enough that we have touched these things by the way, because they specially concern the life of Nero, who payed his Master with an evill reward, entangling him in fuch wicked counfells. On the other fide also it cannot be denied, that Burrus and Seneca yielded too much to the civell will of this Paricide. And as for the extremity they feared, there were means enough to have holpen it: and we must never do evil , that good may come of it. And what good could come of fuch an exercise abomination? For though Agripping deferved fuch a cruell punishment, for fo many wicked deeds as she had done, yet should not her Son have had his hand in it; and his counsellers should not have confented unto it, nor Anicetus have executed it. As all were much to be blamed for this seed, yet some more then other; so they had all their turn, as Tacism and Successions do show

Burrus dislodged the first, and as least to be blamed for so many dislorders, he was spared, in that he faw not the other incredible confusions that fell our afterwards. His throat fwelling within, by Bierner dieth: little and little, he died, his pipes being stopped that he could fetch no wind. Many affirmed, faith Tacines, that by the commandment of Ners, making as though they would help him, the palate of his mouth was rubbed with poifon, and that Burrus perceived that wickedness, and when Nero came to fee him, he would not vouchfafe to look on him, but turned on the other fide. And Ngro ask. ing him how he did, he answered onely, I am well. This man was wonderfully lamented of the ROMANS, because of his vertue, and of the foolishees of one of his succeptours, and of the notable villanies of the other called Tigellinus, who was the utter ruine of Nero. The death of Barrus much impaired the power and authority of Seneea: for that the means to do good were weak, as having loft the half part of their life; and because that Mero inclined unto those which held him up in his wickedness, against the which Senses opposed himself as time and occasion would fuffer him. But his enemies having the Princes ear, they failed not to fet upon this honourable perfon, because of his age and the services he had done to Neve. They did falfly accuse him, saith Taci-Seneca acculed 1817, for that he having great riches, and more then was fit for a private man, he did fill encrease by his enemies. them, and grew greater and befides did gain and draw the good will of the people too much unto him. That he had goodlier gardens and more fumptuous houles of pleafure, then the Emperor himfelf. Furthermore, that he imputed all the honour to himself for knowing how to speak excellently well: and that he made Vertes oftner then he was wont, after that he perceived Nero took plafure to make them himself. That flatly condemning Nero his exercises, he mocked him, seing him ride and mannage horfes, and laughed at him hearing him fing. And all this was but to make men believe that nothing was well done in the affairs of the effate, that proceeded not from his invention. Now that Nero was come out of his infancy, and in the flower of his youth, that he should leave his mafter, considering that his ancestors should serve him well enough for great and good tutors: Seneca understanding by the report of those shar yet somewhat regarded great and good uttors: Seneta understanding by the report of more and year withdraw yearner and honour, how these lewed incensers did accuse him, perceiving also that Nero withdraw yearner and honour, how these lewed incensers did accuse him, perceiving also that Nero withdraw himself more and more from his familiarity, which he had shewed in times past, he befought him to hear him , the which having obtained , he faid thus unto him , My Lord , it is now fourteen years since I was first called to accompany the great hope that was had of your infancy, and eight general Orayears fince you have been Emperor: during which time you have heaped to much goods and honour upon me, that nothing wanteth to my felicity, but to know how to use them well. To his purpose I will lay before you notable examples practifed by men of your quality, not of mine. Asguffus great father of your grandfathers father, licenfed M. Agrippa to withdraw himself unto MYTILENE, to lead a private life: and to C. Mecena to live at his case within ROME it felf, as in some pleasant remote place sarther off. The one of them had accompanied him in his Wars, and the other having been beaten and tormented with great Tempests in Rome, had heen both, to speak the truth, amply recompenced, as also the great service they had done well deferved it. As for my felf, I brought nothing that deferved you should be so noble and liberal unto me, but onely my Studies nourished (if I may be so bold to speak it) in the shadow, and covertly, from whence notwithstanding all my reputation is proceeded, for as much as it seemeth I have been in your Apprentiships: which truly is to me a great reward and rich recompence. But befides all this , you have infinitely favoured me , and prefented me with innumerable Goods. Insomuch that I often reason thus with my self: Is it possible, that I that am but of a simple House of Knights (also dwelling without ROME) should hold the place of one of the chiefest Lords of ROME ? and amongst the most Noble, and those that are noted to be of so great Antiquity, that a new come man as my felf, hath dared to shew himself in place? Where is that Spirit that contented it felf with Mediocrity? What meaneth he to have so fine and goodly Gardens? What? he walketh by such and such Houses of Pleasures, near unto the City. His Lands and Possessions are of fo great an extent, and his Money bringeth him in fuch a commodity many ways, that he is full to the throat. For the which there is nothing to be offered, but a defence for my felf; That I could not refuse your Presents. Now we have, both the one and the other, performed our duty you, in giving so much as a Prince could give to him that he loveth, and I, in receiving that which a man in great favour might have and take of his Prince. As for my Honours and Estates, envy looketh awry upon me: howbeit (as all other things of the World) fhe is under the feet of your greatness. Yet in the mean time she lighteth upon me, and therefore I have need of help. And as in War, or otherwise travelling abroad, if I were weary I would require rest: so finding my felf in the Travell of this Life now old, and very unmeet for the least Office, fince I can no longer support the burthen of my Riches, I do desire to be discharged. Command therefore that your Receivers henceforth do take them and put them into your Treasure. I shall not therefore become poor, but when I shall be rid of those things which blind-fold me with their brightnels, I shall bestow my time in study, which I was wont to employ in my Gardens and Possessia ons. You are young and lufty, and time hath established you in the greatness of your Estate: but we that are your ancient Servants have leave as it were to repose our selves. It shall be also a great honour for you to have raifed those to great Office, to whom mean things had sufficed. Nero sanswer Unto this Nero made answer, in manner as followeth: For that on the sudden I do answer your to senter's premeditate Oration, it is because I have learned it of you, that have taught me how I should deal. Oration. not onely in things feen far off, but also in those which are presented upon the sudden unto me. Augustus my Grand-father suffered Agrippa and Macenas to repose themselves after their Travels: but it was in such an age, that his authority might maintain that, and any thing else by him granted: and yet he did not take from the one nor the other any goods that he had given unto them. They got it in the Wars, and with danger of their lives: For Augustus spent his youthin Wars. I do affure my felf that your arms nor hands would have failed me, it I had gone to the Wars: but as the Estate of my affairs did bear, you have by reason, by counsell, and by instructions railed up my infancy and youth. So will I remember all the days of my life the good service I have received at your hands. That which you hold of me, your Gardens, Money in bank, Houses in the Countrey abroad, all that is subject unto divers Accidents. And though all together feem much, yet is it to, that many far short of your deferts have possessed more. I am ashamed to name bondmen made free, whom men see richer then you; and the cause that maketh me ashamed is, that you whom I should cherish above all others, do not pass them in Riches and humane greatness. Furthermore, you are yet in good age, to govern your Lands and Revenues, and we do but now enter into managing the affairs of the Empire; but it may be that you efteem your felf less then Vitellim, three times Confull : and commend Claudius above me, as if I could not by my liberality give you as much goods as Volusius by long sparing hath gotten. Moreover, if our flippery and unconstant youth sway on one side more then it ought. you reform it, guiding by your aid and vigilancy that small direction we have. If you bring your Money into my Coffers, if you forfake the Prince, they will not fay it is because you are content with little, and feek your eafe: but their talk shall be none other, but of my coverousnels, and my cruelty. And although they should much praise your moderation in this action, yet it becometh not an old man to feek honour by doing any thing that should dishonour his friend. Wero added to this fine speech, many embracements and kiffes, being made by nature, and brought by custom to cover his malice with falle and counterfeit kindness. Seneca (as it is the conclusion of a speech holden with him that commandeth) thanked him: yet he immediately changed his accustomed manner he was wont to use during his former greatness : gave them leave to depart that came every morning in Troops to falute him; turned away from others that offered to follow and accompany him : very feldom he went into the City, and stirred Senecachangnot out of his house, as if he had been fick, or troubled after his study of Philosophy. This was eth his tormer the talk betwirt Nero and Seneca, who having leasure to bethink himself better of the answer Custom: of Nero, knew very well that his fortune was changed, and that the Disciple was become the Master: yea and that so much more dangerous, for that his cruell courage was wrapped up in so gracious words and countenances, the which a man was conftrained to truft, or at the least to make Nero being as it were overcome by Seneca, was as cruell and more then before, counfelled by Qqqq3

Tigellinus and Popaa. First of all then he began to cut off the heads of Plautus and Sylla, honour-

ablemen, banished before into Asia and to Marshilles. He refused, confined, and finally ties and heaft- put to death his Wife, the Princels Octavia, using an infamous and strange manner in his proceedings against her. He married the Adultres Popea, who brought him a Daughter that died soon after. He counterfeited the Player, always intermixing fome new cruelty with his passimes. Afterwards he being prefent at a Banquet made by Tseellinus, in the which were committed all forts of villanies, and he himself being defiled with naturall and unnaturall whoredoms and abomination ons, within few days after (a matter incredible, if so many grave Historians, amongst others Tasitus did not affureus of it) he married one Pythagoras, as his Husband, which was of the company of these Villains, and was solemnly married according to the Custom of other Marriages. The yellow Veil of the married couple covered Nero's head. Soothsayers were sen for, the joyner was affigned, the Bed of the Spoule prepared, the wedding Torches were lighted : and to be short they faw that openly which the night hideth, when the question of Marriage is in hand with a Woman. Thirdly he fet fire on a great number of houses in ROME, so as the most part were burnt. And to clear himself of this wickedness, he faisly layed it upon the Christians, (being a great number at that time in ROME) that they were the author of this disorder: massmuch that they failty accused were fet upon with a strange cruelty. And yet as they put them to death, they did a thousand and perfecuted mockeries unto them, putting beafts Skins upon them to be torn in pieces with Dogs, or else they were hanged upon the Crofs, or burnt with a little fire: their Wood-houles or Stacks of Wood ferved to give light in the night. Now though the People of Rome were bloodily bent against these innocents, yet there were many that had pitty of them, seeing honest men tormented, to satisfie the cruell insolency of Nero: who apparelled like a Coach-man, and driving the Horse himself in the midst of these consusions, made the People passime. Besides all this he forraged and ransacked all ITALY with Impositions and excessive Lones, ruining the Towns, and not fparing also the Temples of ROME, of ASIA, nor of GREECE. It was given out abroad, faith Tacitus, that Seneca (whom Nero went oftentimes to visit, to keep him in breath, and gently to full him affeep) to avoid the fuspition that he had been of counsell in this facriledge, had asked leave to go to some House of his far into the Countrey. Which being denied him, he kept his Chamber faining to be fick of the Gout. Some have written that a bondman of his enfranchiled, called Cleonicus, did prepare to poylon him by the commandment of Nero: the which he avoided upon warning given him by him, or for that he feared fuch a thing, living meanly, eating fuch Fruits as were brought him out of the Countrey, and being contented to drink clear running Water if he were athirft. Such deteftable wickedness of Nero having of long time offended many honourable Perfons, which could no longer endure fuch a Mafter, they refolved to fet themfelves at liberty, and conspired to kill him one day when they faw opportunity. The day being come, one called Milliem, an enfranchifed bondman of one of the principal Conspirators, went to discover to Nero what they had complotted against him. This gave a strange Alarm unto the Emperor, who caused them to lay hands of one another, amongst which number there was Lucan the Nephew of Seneca, that was a party in this conspiracy, for anger against Nero: who was the cause that his Verses were not had in that estimation they deserved, and commanded him not to publish them, thinking (but in vain) that he could make as good. From that time forth they could fee nothing in ROME but imprisoning of men of quality, and preparation for execution

Seneca, that stirred not out of the Countrey was not forgotten of Popaa, nor of Tigellinus Nero can foon which were the fecret counfellors of Nero in his cruelties. And Nero also failed not to take hold of find a staff to this occasion to take away his School-master, whose shadow did torment him. It was not for that Seneca was partaker of the counfell with the Conspirators, but Nero was glad to find the mean to dispatch him with a Sword, fince he could not do it by poyson. For one of the Conspirators called Natalis (whom Nero had pardoned) faid nothing elfe of him, but that he was fent to visit Seneca being fick, and to complain because he thought not good that Pifo (being the head of this enterprife, and should be created Emperor after the murther of Nero) should come to see him, and that he would confirm their friendship, frequenting familiarly together: but that Seneca had answered, that their talk and meeting would neither be profitable for the one, nor for the other: and moreover, that his life depended upon that of Pifo. Gravius Silvanus Captain of a Band-of Guards, was commanded to go to Seneca, to know if he would take any knowledge to have spoken the words confessed by Natalis, and the answer that he made at that time. By chance, or wittingly, Sineca was come home that very day, and remained in a house of his two small Miles from RONE. Pompels PauThe Captain came thither about night, and placed his Souldiers round about the house: and aftertina the Wife wards came in, and found Seneca at supper with his Wife Pompeia Paulina, and two of his friends. So having delivered his meffage unto him, Seneca answered straight being nothing moved; that Natalis was indeed fent unto him to complain in the Name of Pife, for that Seneca would not fuffer him to come and fee him: and that for himfelf, he did excuse himfelf as well by reason of his sicke nels, as for the delire hehad to take his ease. And for those words: that his life depended upon that of Pifo, he faid he had no occasion to prefer the prefervation of another private mans life before his own. And that furthermore, he gave not his mind to flatteries, whereof he would have no better testimony then Nero bimself, who had offner known that Seneca was a Free-man, then 3 Slave or a Bondman. Silvanus returned unto Nero, and made report in the prefence of Popaa and

Tigellinus, who were very defirous to hear his answer: which being heard, Nero asked him, if Seneca made any shew to be willing to die. The Captain affured him that he perceived no fign of fear nor of forrow, in the words, nor countenance of Seneca. Thereupon Nero commanded this Captain to return to Senera, and to command him to die. Some think that this Execu-Nero sendent Captain to return to Senera, and to command min to the Source mine that this Execute tioner returned not again that way he was come, but went another way, to find out Fenius Captions of the Mellinge of the service of rain of the Guards, whom after he had acquainted with Nero's commandment, he asked him if he death. would execute this Commission. Fenius that was of the number of the Conspirators, nevertheless advised him to obey the Emperors commandment, by a fatal cowardliness of as many as were of them. For Silvanus that had this commission to go to Seneca, was also one of the confipracy, and yet his hand was ready to encrease the wickedness of Nero, of the which before he was defirous and procured to fee the punishment. To hide his offence in some fort, he would not, or durft not return into the presence of Seneca, nor speak to him : but made one of his Centeners go into the house to declare the Emperors commandment, which was that Seneca must die. At that time it was half a favour unto those that were condemned to lose their lives, to suffer them that time it was nan a bayon under those the medical and the same and vers forts. Some pricked their Veins, and let themselves bloud, and then went into a hot-house solves to death where they ended. Others swallowed down poyson: Others stabbed themselves in with their divers ways. Daggers, or their Swords. It is judged this was done: that they should not fall into the hands of the Hang-man: for when it happed to, the bodies of the condemned were not buried, and their Gods were forfeited: whereas if they put themfelves to death (of the which the most part following the Doctrine of the Stoick's were nothing atraid) their bodies should be buried, and their Buried and thei

Now to return to Seneca. Having heard the Message of the Centener, without changing countenance, and wholly resolved, he called for his Book of Tables, in the which was written his will. Seneca undantation to the seneral day the seneral day that seneral day the seneral day the seneral day that seneral day the seneral day the seneral day the seneral day that seneral day the seneral day the seneral day that seneral day the which being denied him by the Centener, turning to his friends, he protefled, that fince he was let to fige of death. acknowledge their merits, that he would leave one onely thing (and notwithftanding the best) yet his. to wit, the Image of the example of his life, the which if they remembred, they would carry a commendable reputation of honest and vertuous men, for a worthy reward of so constant a friendship. And feeing them weep, he fought to appeale them, or to flay their tears, now with fweet words, by and by with vehemency, as if he would have reproved them. To conclude, he did encourage them to re- seneral encoumain firm and constant, asking them where was the resolution they had learned so many years in rageth his the Schools and Studies of Philosophy, against all the chances of the world. He added further, that friends, every one knew well what Nero was, what cruelties he had committed: and after that he had so wickedly behaved himself to his Father-in-law, to his Mother, to his Brother, and to his Wife, there was nothing left behind for the accomplishment of his cruelties, but to add the murther of his School- senecacomformafter. After he had discoursed such or the like words before them all, and as in generall, heems teth his Wife braced his Wife, and having a little emboldened her against this blow, he instantly prayed her to tho- against the feat derate her grief, and exhorted her to remember how vertuously he had passed his life, and gently to of death. bear (and with a heart worthy her felf) the forrow of the death of her Husband. She for her part affured him that the was refolved to die, and bad one of them give her the blow. Then Seneca. not to deprive himself of that honour, and being touched with the love he did bear her, was contented not to leave to the mercy of the diffolintion that then reigned, her whom he had most dearly loved. I did fet before you (faid he) the sweetness of life : but fince your felf have chosen rather an honourable death, for my part, I shall not be forry if you shew me the way. Let the constancy therefore of fo couragious a death as ours, be alike to us both a although the end of your life shall senera and the be more famous. Immediately thereupon, they caused the Veins of their arms to be opened: but Wise would because that Seneca had an old body, and thin by eating little, there would no blood come out but have died by drop by drop, he made the Veins of his legs and hams to be cut. Then weary of such a cruell bleeding. butchery, being afraid that his pains would make his Wives heart fail her, or that he himfelf should grow impatient for fo many torments as he endured, he perswaded her to withdraw her self into another Chamber: and for himself, having to his last gasp his words at commandment; he caused his Secretaries that were wont to write under him, to come unto him, and told them there many notable things in fine terms, the which were published after his death : but time hath taken them from us for want of Story-writers : although some think that that might be kept as well as other Writings of Seneca. Others carrying some envy to the Vertue of this man, have kept it back, being loath that the Posterity should enjoy a Table, where the Visage of Seneca might be better known, then in other places of his Works. Nero that had men coming and going every minute of an hour from Seneca's house to Rome, understanding how every thing passed, and manders to every minute of an hout from Seneca's house to Rome, understanding how every thing patied, and the bearing no particular harred to Paulina, fearing also he should encrease the blame of his cruelty. Secured Wife he commanded they should keep Paulina from dying. Wherefore his Slaves and freed bond should be kept men, warned by the Souldiers themselves, bound up her Arms, and staunched the blood, not know- from death, ing whether she felt any thing or not. For as there are always among the People that take things at the worst, there wanted not men which thought that so long as Paulina stood in sear of Nero's anger, fhe defired to have the report that she was a companion of the death of her Husband. But afterwards when there was a better hope offered her, she was contented to be won with the flatteries of life, unto the which the added fome few years with commendable memory and forrow for her Husband: being otherwife so pale of countenance, that she shewed to have lost a norrow for the russiana county of the other fide Seneca feeing his death prolonged, he prayed Statists Annaus (whom he efterned much for his faithfull friendship he had born him a long time, and for his Skill in Physick) to bring him of the like poyson to that which they keep by publick Ordinance in ATHENS to put offenders to death, whereof he had of long time made provision. So when it was brought him, he swallowed it down without regard, his members being cold, and his body constant against the force of the Poylon. In the end, he entred into a bathing Tub of hot Water, with the which forinckling his flaves that were about him, he added to it, that he offered this liquour unto Japiter the deliverer. After that being carried into a Stove, and having through the heat thereof yielded up the ghoft, his body was buried without any folemnity of Obfequies. He had to appointed by his Will made at that time when he was very rich, and of great credit. It was reported that Sabrius Flavius one of the chiefest Conspirators, had secretly determined was reported that one in the content of the content means of Pife, they should also dispatch Pife himself, to the end to make Seneca Emperor, as an honelt man, onely elect and chosen to that greatness for the fame of his Vertues. Such was the end of Seneca, that had lived in honourable and publick charges, of Prator, Questor and Confull under two Emperors, and was long in credit with the last: who seeing himself coverily despited of his Master, that could no longer endure such wickedness, sought the occasion before mentioned, but with extream injuffice, to rid him out of the way. Furthermore, Dion thinketh that Seneca's two Brethren were likewise put to death. But because he is contented to touch it but in a Line, and that which Tacitus faith is to be marked, fet down in particular, and with most likely circumstances; we will speak one word more. Shortly after the death of Seneca, he commanded they should put Annam Lucanm to death, the Son of Mela: who seeling his Nero commands A. Lu. rect and in the extremities of his body, his heart being yet lively; and his understanding good, calling certain Verles of Poetry to mind, in the which was prefetted a Souldier hurr, dying of the same death, he recited the fame Verses, which were the last words he spake. Altitia Lucans Mother was left alive, neither being pardoned nor punished. For Junius Gallio, who was a Senator, was so a-Stonished ar the death of his Brother, that before all the Senate he fell down at Nero's feet beseching him to give him his life. Whereupon another Senator called Alienns Clemens, fet upon him with injurious words, calling him Traitor and parricide. But the other Senators with one confent made Clement hold his peace; telling him that he should not seek common adversities for to revenge his privatequartell, or to draw on the Prince to a new cruelty, who had now by his clemen-cy quieted and forgotten all. Within a few moneths after Annaus Mela was dispatched: he was a Knight of ROME, but of the Dignity of a Senator. And although Seneca and Gallio his Brethren were advanced to greatet honour, yet he would never purchase it by extremity of ambition; but being come out of Spain to Rome, more for the love of his Brethren and of his Son then for himself, he was contented to have this honour, that a Knight was ever equall in power and credit with a Confull. The Name of his Son Lucanus greatly efteemed of every body, and specially of Learned-men, had gotten him great reputation. Immediately after his Sons death, he feeking fomewhat too eagerly after his Sons goods, raifed against him an Accuser called Fabius Romanut, one of Lucanus chiefest friends. This man shewed counterfeit Letters as done by Lucanus, which charged Mela that he was partaker with his Son of the complot against Nero. Though this The death of Acculation was utterly falfe and feigned, yet Nero that thirsted after the riches of Mela, commanded those Letters should be carried to Mela: that was as much to say, he must die. The which Mela knowing well enough, made his Veins to be opened, and followed the way of others. Seneca in his Writings yieldeth great teftimony of the constancy and Vertue of his Brethren: and I think he was a man that was not given to fpeak lightly. Notwithstanding, I have simply recited that which Tacitus faith, who fufficiently showeth in the example of divers others that it is not to be marvelled at if the cruelties of Nero, who less spared the great then the small, made the boldest hearts of them all quake fornetimes.

Now there remaineth to tell you fomething of the Philosophy and Writings of Seneca: for it is phy and Write- in those Tables that we must look to see him lively, and speaking with that self vehemency of spirit ings of senter, that followed him even to the last salto of his life. It is true that the insolencies of Nero had oftenthat followed him even to the laft gaip of his life. It is true that the infolencies of Noro had oftentimes as it were stopped his mouth, and hindered that good Soul to give free passage to his discourse, yea and in some places they made him stumble. Yet he called himself back again to his first thoughts, and remained conftant in the midft of the cruell raging ftorms of his time. Now as it is easie for men that be on the Land where they do idly behold fome Mafter Pilot striving with the force and fury of the wind and billows, to fay: That man there should guide his Ship after another fashion: who if they were in his place, should without all comparison find themselves more troubled, or at the leaft would make a forrowfull wrack. Even fo is hapneth, that Seneca's Philosophy is despited of many, that think he could speak Philosophy but by his Book, and that then when he should come to shew it in deed, men would say he doth like the Masters of Fence, who being in a School of Fence, with young Youths, they downders, and give mortall Vennies at pleasure: but if they come to have been a any private Fight at the Sharp, where it Handeth them upon for their lives, affoon as they fee the Philosopher in gliftering of the naked Sword, you may perceive all their flourishes and tricks are gone, or changed into flat running away. I will say at one word, that I think Senece as much and more a Philosopher in deed then in name. His life and his death can fay it, and in the last Chapter hereafter we must fpeak more at large. For this present let us a little confider his tongue. Life is a sweet thing, and all defire to live, yea the beafts themselves seem to have a singular contentment, for that they have a being and life. If life be a pleafant thing, yet it is much more pleafing and acceptable when it is well governed, and tendeth to a good end. So then a quiet and contented life is much better, fweeter, and more excellent, then a lifefull of troubles and passions. This quietness is none other but selicity and good fortune. Furthermore, all men do not aspire to this end, but onely wise men, and the true friends of wildom. For the most part of men whom the earth sustaineth, do run a strange course when they should set a foot forward to betake them to some course of life; and all in manner erre, when they should Judge what happy life is. Those that delight in money and to gain, in judging feek felicity in riches. The idle and floathfull think, that to make great chear, to live (as they fay) happy life in the shadow of Tables, of Pots, of Curtains, and at theease of their bodies, is the onely soveraign good. There are another fort of men greedy of worldly honour, which establish an unipeakable happinels to command many (in what manner, or how dear foever it be) taking themselves to be half gods, if they may fee many men, or two or three go under their feet. But wife men e-Rablish soveraign good in vertue. And if they be asked, what is a happy life? they answer. That it consistent in living vertuously and serving God. This was the Philosophy of Seneca in generall. Happy the But because there are certain clouds of opinions which darken humane felicity, it is good we look what. to examine them briefly. Nature hath dispersed in us some seeds of vertue, and hath given us some grains of knowledge and wisdom, which are born with us and take root (if we may say so) in grams or knowledge and windom, which are both while to and take root (if we may fay 10) in our hearts. This nonwithflanding, we must manure it, and vertue hath her precepts which openet the the way to attain the foveraign good, whereunto the Philosophy of the Stocks dorth lummon us. Four things are enemies to that good, yea they obscure it, they corrupt and abolish it in an Four things evil disposed heart. The first cause is death, that is to say, the fear and imagination to lose this nemies to mank earthly and corruptible life. For where there is fear, it cannot be faid there is contentment and good. felicity, but milery: it is not a pleasant life, but a forrowfull life, and a torment of the mind. The fectord is the bodily griefs, lingering difeases, the torments and tortures cruel and sharp in a shouland kinds: and briefly a thousand evils which hurt the concentment of the soul. For no man will fav, that to be troubled in his mind with a burning Feaver, to cry out night and day because of the Gout, or for pain of his Teeth and the Reins, or to be brought to any extraordinary toron the Gours, of the parties of the hangman, is a thing where there is no apprehends that moved the fpirit. Befides all this, there are the griefs of the foul a mourning, loss of children, of kinsfolks and dear friends: for that afflicteth and eateth our thoughts withour ceafing, and giveth Tragical Poets ample arguments to write upon. If the grief of the body affecteth the reft and contenment of the mind, much more doth the inward grief and anguish. And finally there are pasfions, as joy and pleasure, which hinder and abolish the feeling of a happy life. Those that are pollefled with an extraordinary joy, oftentimes both do and fay many fond things and jeftures, in words and works. As if a man be told that land is fallen to him, or that he is raifed to wished dignity not looked for, ye shall see him play the fool and wanton like a child. There are some whose manners honour changeth in such fort, that from the day rill the next morning you shall mor know them by their face, by their countenances, by their words, nor by their apparell: they will ftraight didain them that they called before fervants or loving friends. Now this vain bride and foolilhnels are in manner one felf thing; and it may be faid, that all ambitious men are altogether beforted, or doubtless they will be fo. If thou wilt make me fee a proud man. are autogether resources.

The area of that prefument to know much, and that looketh upon his feathers, as fifty fay, I will prefently the a fool furnished at all pieces. There is no furer fign of foolishness then pride: and who will lay then that the life of fuch a one is happy? And as for pleafures, we fee how a man is carried away, who then is no more himself: but to the contrary, thinketh that the destruction of body and foul is his foveraign good. Now amongst all the Philosophers which have tried to remedy these troubles of the mind, and to maintain a man in this contenument which they eall foveraign, it may be faid the Stoicks were the chief, and among the Stoicks Seneca. I will not here enter into examination of the doctrine of this Sect, nor declare that which Zeno and Chrysippus have written, as may be gathered of Laertins and of Plutarch, but simply to thay my felt upon my principal purpole, which is of Seneca; and in this place to follow that which many learned men have gathered of his works, to fhew what was his Philosophy: unto the which we will add fome Summary of reasons with the which he helpeth himself, to fight with those passions, and to make the soul at peace, as much as he himself could apprehend it. This is out of all question, that Seneca was one of the first and principal Philosophers of the Seneca prefer-Stoicks among the Latins, as he himself doth boast in his own writings. Furthermore, he ex-red the Stoicks alterth this Sect above all others, and faith, that the Stoicks do make profellion of a Philosophy before allother works of men. Greatment as there is difference betwirt them and others as between males and Philosophers. worthy of men : forasmuch as there is difference betwirt them and others, as betwirt males and females. That the other kinds of Philosophy are made, to hear and to obey: but that the Stoick is born to teach, and command. He being desirous to present some perfect Idaa of a wise man, bringeth forth Cato: and in the Treaty where he will thew that the wife man cannot be offended nor outraged, he lifteth up this man out of the ranck of all other men, and specially commendeth him in his death. If he spake of the Stoicks, he calleth them his, and doth make open profellon of their instructions. Now in many places he distinguisheth Philosophy into three parts, which he calleth Rationall, Morall, and naturall. But after the fathion of the Stoicks, he rested more upon the Morall, albeit that all his discourses shew that he had a marvellous vein in the rationall. And the books of naturall questions shew that he had a deep insight in the secrets of Nature. So then his principal end was to frame good manners, and to bring men to the knowledge of the contentment of the mind, to defire and apprehend it. They faw him oftentimes exhort Lucilius to the study of Morall Philosophy, as in the end of his 89, Epistle: So set down these things, faith he to others, that thou thy felf maift take pleasure to comprehend them. Write, to read afterwards thy Writing, referring all things to the reformation of life, and to the means of appealing the fury of passions. Study, not to be wifer then others, but to be better. On the other side, he turned the fame Lucilius from the study of Logick, and from the subtile disputations, in the which they please themselves that do but linger after fyllables and words. Leave (faid he to him in the 71. Epifle) this occupation and lifting of letters, to thole mafters that shut up a thing so magnificent as Philosophy is, in fyllables : and do imbrace, yea bring to nothing, and unerly deftroy the mind, in teaching things that are not worth the labour and fludy. I am content that thou refemble wife men that have invented letters, but not those that teach them. In some other places he laugheth at the subtilties of these School disputers, namely, where he setteth down one of their fathions of speech, to wit, in the forty eight, which is the forty ninth in the Editions not well corrected, upon to with, in the corrected, upon these words: Mus (that is to say, a Mouse) is a syllable: a Mouse earth Cheese, therefore it followeth that a syllable earth Cheese. But it is not onely that he setteth upon Logick, or rational Philosophy, but also on Sciences commonly called the liberall Sciences and assembly. question of the Philosophy of manners, Witness that which he writeth in the fourscore and eighth Mark Lower h 324 Epiffle worthy to be diligently read of all, but especially of them whom such sciences do pust up, and who for the rest do little care to rule their life within the compass of vertue. In sum, he deand who for the state of places, that Philosophy confifteth not in the knowledge of those things; but that the end thereof is, to give counfell against all the accidents of this life: and that men were wont to repair unto Philosophers, who do shew them in the midst of darkness (wherewith humane fociety is fnared) the way they must follow not to erre, shewing what things are necessary and profitable: how easie the Laws of Nature are: how joyfully we live, and at our ease, following of the same. And to the contrary, that there can be nothing but milery in the condition of those, which suffer themselves to wander rather by opinion, then by Nature and Reason. I think thereforethat all the Philosophy of Seneca looketh unto that, to establish the mind all that may be : to attain to the which, it speaketh of the soveraign good, to the end to draw us to aspire unto it. And because the accidents of this life, namely the causes before mentioned, do observe this happiness, he striveth with infinite discourses and reasons against them. Now it were to make a great volume, if all were put together that he speaketh, and it were better to leave it to their liberty that shall read the works of this Philosopher, of the which I will note here fome heads or rules, on the which he reafoneth very amply to remedy the griefs before named. The intention therefore of Seneca, above all in matters most important, isto beat down first, all corporeall and spirituall passions: to wit, opinion and apprehension. He discoveresh the vanity, sheweith the wrong which men of understanding do, and the error of their judgement, who fee things as in the water, and with a corrupt eye. Which done, he goeth further, and feeketh to shew, that when that which is called evil is arrived, the wife man feeleth it not : as also it is as little trouble to him when one thinketh to touch him, as it is then No man hurt when one threatned him afar off. For proof of this, he sheweth that they cannot hurt a wise man out by himfelf, any manner of way: and that no man is injured or hurt but by himfelf. That the wife man bending all his thoughts unto vertue, cannot be offended, but rather overcometh all humane accidents, as well for respect of himself, as for all others. Hereupon he cometh to this point, to maintain, that that which they call evil, is good to the wife man: who like a good husband maketh his profit of all in such fort, that there is nothing in the world but serveth his turn, and whereof he is not master with a fingular contentment. Or mete rules and maximes, there rile many Paradoxes dispersed in his books, the which it a man confider apart, are very ftrange and ridiculous withall: but being brought to their originals, they may receive some exposition. Furthermore to frame a perfect wise man, he will have nothing pleafant unto him but vertue, which confifteth in contemning all that the world admireth: and a love of beautifull things which give contentment to the foul. That all that which is earthly and corruptible, should be esteemed as much as nothing; that the wise man infolding himfelf in his vertue, feeth all the greatness of this world very low under him, and as it were troden under the feet of his heart. And that in the midst of all dangers, yea even in the most fiercest death of all, and when heaven should fall upon him, he remaineth merry and pleased with the selicity which his vertue bringeth unto him. Afterwards he reasoneth particularly against the apprehension of death: and sheweth that it is as inevitable, as it is also good and necessary. That the greatest contenument of a wife man is, that he can break in funder the Iron Chain that holdeth him, as often and when he thinketh good : and upon this occasion treateth in some places of the immortality of the foul, as in the end of the feven and fiftieth Epiftle, in the threefcore and fifth, threescore and fixteenth, and the hundred and seventeenth, in his comfortable discourse unto Martia, and elfewhere. Touching these corporal pains, he sheweth that they cannot turn a man out of the path-way of Vertue, nor from the profession of constancy and truth, nor from the resolution to maintain a just cause. That there is no pain or grief so sharp, that can let a wise man to think of his duty, and to acquaint himself so far as his hands may reach. That these corporal griefs cannot eclipse the least of the beams of vertue, and the hope of the immortality of our fouls, for the which we exchange in the day that our pains come, as it were to have greatest strength, all the difcommodities we apprehend in this transitory life. Furthermore, that the troubles which the estate of this world doth spread as a veil before our minds, cannot blindfold them to see the perfect beauty of vertue, and to hear the excellent comforts which she proposeth. Also that the wife man fufficiently defended not to be overcome by pathons, which have no power on him that is in the ordinary safeguard and protection of vertue, in possession whereof he is already so entred, that he fill goeth forward every day more then other, shortly to enjoy her with periection. To conclude, that there is hindrance at all for him whom vertue pleafeth, and whom the bringeth to immortality. And this is a little touch (me thinketh) which may be particularly noted in Seneca: in the beauty whereof, as in faces better formed, there are fome spots discovered as in other Philosophers, namely the Stoicks. Above all, in his protraicture of this wife man, he imagineth in this life a thing that is not to be found in a corrupt man given over to fenfuality; which is, vertue and perfection. But let us refer that to the ignorance of true Religion, and confider this Philosopher in the limits of his feet. For other Paradoxes, as of the world, of the spirit, of passions and affections of vertue, and fome others borrowed of the School of his Mafters, that i lutareh hath examined in his book of Common conceptions, and in that which he entituleth, The contradiction of the Stoicks: that which is evil doth condemn it felf, or exculeth it felf under the questions and disputations, which permit a man to say somewhat. And for the other, for a source made profession to form manners, he seemeth therein to have given way and free passage to some of his conceptions, and after the example of Painters, to give fome shadows unto his Tables, the better to retain the judgement of the Reader. That which I least allow in him, or rather which I cannor What is mit. approve, is the excessive praise he givest to his wife man, litting him up, yea above the goods. And liked in Street. approve, is in executive prane in ground of his wife man put himself to death, and of his authority and power diffolve the bands of this life, without leave of the loveraign Captain, and with a celtimony of a strange cowardines and distrust of the doctrine of the eternal Providence; the which would have us keep a ftediaft hope and confidence, yea even when things feem to be most delperate. And that which he often applieth unto the death of Cato, whom he inhintely commendch, hath been by us examined in the comparison of Caro and Photion. Furthermore, Some a stay. of not upon one or two in his difcourfes he hath left unto us, but hath culled out all the Philofophers, Greeks and Latines which were before him, all that he thought good to fet down for the rule and government of our life, according to the end he looked unto. And as for his writings, all that we have left concerning morall and naturall Philosophy, with the pleasant discourse upon the death of Claudius, is out of all disputation until this present: as the stile that is hard, thort, fententious, and in apt terms for that time, and after the manner of teaching of the Soicks, doth shew it. But for the books entimaled Controversia co- Saafasia, that is to say, pleadings and orations, or declamations, I am of the same opinion that divers learned men of our time are, to wit, that thele books are not of Seneca, but of the father of Seneca. And because many other learned men ancient and modern have thought the contrary, we must need say somewhat for proof of the opinion which we follow. The author of these collections saith, that he heard ovid and Gicero declaim, and that he was familiar with Portim Latro, Valerim, Messala, and with others that were in the time of Angustus. When he heard Cicero, he could be no less then fifteen years old: how can that be attributed unto Seneca, dead in the end of the Empire of Nero, well-near fixfore years after that time? Now, that which Tacinas speaketh in divers places of the age of Seneca, reacheth not so far : and Nero speaking to Senesa a little before his death, said, that he had by tracending to the first speaking to sense a fine octors in usual, said, matternau yet firength enough to the his goods and govern his possessions; that could not be spoken of an old man of anhundred and twelve years old. Also Senses speaketh otherwise of his age in one of his Epistles, noted here before, where he telleth, that about the fifth year of the Empire of Tibeing, he came out of his infancy, of the age of eighteen years. Furthermore, Seneca was Prator, Quartor, and Confull, as in his discourse to his mother Elbia, the Chronicles, and the lawyers books do make mention. And to the contrary, his father dedicating his books above named unto Seneca, Junius, and Mela, his three fons: and speaking to Mela in the Presace of his frond book of pleadings, he exhorteth him to follow the inclination of his mind, and contenting himself with the state of a private Gentleman, and a Roman Knight as his father, the better to warrant his life in the hazards and accidents of this world. That which made Seneca to be effected warian ins inc in the macaus and attraction of this works.

I have write the control the books there, is, for that his father did bear that name: and that the face, Sences, Novasus (furnamed Junius Gallo) and Mela be brethren, and the fons of one felf father and mother, it appeared by the Hiftory of Tacisus, in the fifteenth book of his Annals, and by the writings of Seneca himfelf, especially by the discourse to Elbia, where he saith amongst other things: Confider my brethren, that being fair, you have not cause to accuse Fortune: you have in them cause to rejoyce in a divers kind. For the one, through his good wit hath attained to honour, and the other hath wifely despited it. Tacitus plainly thewed that, as we have seen here before. And whereas commonly they alledge the age of Seneca to be fix (core years and aone, to give the more authority to the pleadings and Orations of his father, that is to fay, to the faguents which he seemeth to have set forth in the savour of his children, to frame them betimes one day to practife that whereof he made profession, to wit, eloquence : there cannot be shewed tay furficient or authentick testimony of that which is alledged, that Seneca had three sons conferred with the life and doctrine of them unto whom they were attributed. We do not meet with any thing to much in the writings of Seneca, as the constancy and contempt of death; how cometh it then that you shall not find one word that sheweth him to be a Chrifian? that Nero had not discovered or perceived any thing to charge Seneca with, when he commanded him to die? For that had been an ample discharge before the people that ex-treamly hated the Christians, Suetonism and Tacitus, little favouring our Religion, would not have forgotten it. But how chanceth it that in his death he remembred Jupiter, and not Christ? Now in regard of the Catalogue which is alledged for a Buckler, I defire that learned men do confider, if they have not wronged the person to whom it is attributed, a Christian , know that it is a Pagan that speaketh. There are many things that may inflame us with the love of vertue: they will prick us more nearly, if we remember from whom they come. If we meet with any fentences that feem to be drawn out of our fountains, they will be so much the sweeter unto us : and as for uncertain and false opinions , they will offend us less, when we shall say, that it is a Pagan that hath set them out. Let us come to the other point, and consider those that have too much imbased him, either in respect of things impertinent, and evil befeeming the name whereof he maketh profession. But it is better to confute evident flanders by filence, then with long discourse. Some other speak not To plainly, but lay that Sineca lived not after his own precepts. On the contrary, the honour which he maketh often to Epicurus, feemeth to shew that he hath mingled the wickedness of the Epicureans with the austerity of the Stoicks. I grant that Seneca hath not in all the parts of his life flewed this conftancy which he requireth of a wife man, and I perceive well that he hath diffembled too many things in the Government of Nero: the which the wife

Thrasca would never have allowed of the presence, nor of the word, nor of the deed. But mans infirmity is fuch, that that which the mind feeth plainly enough, It cannot or dare not effect it, because of the relistance of reason and pattions: or if it dare, it is stayed with the least object through this naturall faintness that keepeth us back, when we should resolutely follow vertue. Now of this centure there followeth no more, but that the eternall wildom doth give us knowledge of many notable things uttered by the mouth and testimony of this stranger: and in the mean time doth admonish us in no wise to stay our selves upon him that speaketh : which she doth well in her proper house , where she understandeth that we lend

our ears unto those which go with other feet then they should, so that they keep within the bounds of their commission. And as a Sergeant or Herald that had but one eye, or were lame, could notwithstanding deliver a message of importance in the name of the Prince, and must be heard: even so, whatsoever he be that cometh to us with the notes of chast and fair Verity, he ought to have audience, to be believed and followed, to long as he contain-forbidden to Noblemen to poffess gold, filver, earthly goods, and moveables of great value, to that fuch prosperity do not make them drunk, to cause them to despise God and man.

As for the last, be they ancient or modern, whose names I am not content to expres, which very boldly do censure the writings, of Seneca; and in agreeing to him in some excellent thing, they afterwards take license to think him rude in his stile, too rigorous a Judge of

To come again to Sences: I fee that fome bare too much exalted him, as I think; and others have imbated him more then needed. Which being particularly confidered, peradvenure it will not missive: and if it profit not, I hope it will nove the Reader to fome thought higher then mine, both to fearth matters more exactly, as allo to the reader to some mought right then mine, both to scattle matters more casetry, as and of fettle his opinion upon mine with the compals of truth, of mildness, and of vertue. Because A good speech Seneca speaketh amply in some places of the providence and majesty of God, before whom he exhorseth us to walk, and sometimes prayeth Lucilius to live with men as if God saw him, and to speak with God, as if men heard him; also that he died in the end of the Empire of Nero, at which time Saint Paul the Apostle was priloner at ROME; some have thought that Seneca of long time had leaned unto Christian Roligion, by reason whereof his writings were read as proceed ing time natieaned unto-currinan-realigion, by reaton whereof in writings were read as proceeding from a man advanced in the knowledge of the true God. And otherwise he was contented to fpeak in general and as under a veil, of the ignorance of his time, and because he would have them no more envied whom the world did already hate. Briefly, that he was a fecree disciple of Chrift, in the School of his Apostle. In confirmation whereof, they shew certain Letters of Str These unto Paul, with mutuall answers: and they do add also the testimony of a great Christian Doctor, who hath placed Seneca in the Catalogue of Saints, whole fouls we believe are in glory with their Saviour. Howheir certain learned men of our time have spoken their opinion touching all that, to whom I do agree: to wit, that whether Seneca faw the Apostle, and spake withhim, whether he distained to see him, or that he cared not, nor did enquire after him, as I think that he thought then of any thing elferather then of the doctrine taught by Saint Paul: there is nothing in his Life, in his Writings, nor in his Death, that cometh near to the Christian behef and profelling.

On. But if we should call all those Christians, in whose Writingswedo read goodly and true senses of Wildow. Local all those Christians, in whose Writingswedo read goodly and true senses of Wildow. tences of Wildom, Juftice, and the Providence of God, it would make a strange mingling of Scripture with prophane books: and further, they would dispute if the one should be put in the place of the other. As we fee that in the bodies of the books, which for excellency we call the Bible, there are two, in the which the name of God is never expressed, which notwithstanding are holy, and do contain infinite infructions and fingular confolations. Senera having written in fome place, The Godhead is I know not what great thing, yea fo great, that it passeth all mans understanding; or life is dedicated to his service; let us take order to be approved of the same in a hidden conficience is good for nothing; God seeth us; an ancient Doctor faid thereupon; Any hidden to the same of the same man that should know God, could be set forth any more certain verity, then that which is fpoken here by the mouth of a man that knew not what true Religion meant? For he represented the Majefty of God, faying that it is fo great, that mans understanding cannot measure it; and plainly, the Fountain of verity: shewing that the Life of men is not unprofitable (as some Epicureans think) fince it is referred to the glory of the Creator, when they follow Juftice and Picty. Other discourses of Senses might be alledged touching the Providence of God, against idolary, Superfittion, and impiety: but the consequence is not stable, that he hath therefore known any thing of the doctrine of the Gofpel; you shall not find one discourse in all his Writings, and the doctrine of the Stoicks doth in nothing agree with that, which neither flesh nor blood can reveal: and whereof it is not our purpose to speak in this place, which requireth not that we should discount to the hour purpose to speak in this place, which requireth not that we should discover the holy things, and much less that we should mingle them with the prophane.

For proof whereof we do exhort the Reader to take one whole book of Senesa which he liketh of best, and then to examine it all, If I

As for the letters published under the name of Seneca and of Paul, both the stile and the matter frew at the first light, that it is the work of some idle man that thought himself very Letters in the wife, if he diffembled with those which did not fift it fo narrowly. Now, Anadmonit-I think (these are the words of a learned man that had well read Seneca) that it is best on to the Beautiful Control of the for the Reader to take Seneca's Books, as proceeding from a man ignorant of true Religion. der of Seneca's For if you read them as a Pagan, he hath written like a Christian: but if you take him for books,

For Epicurus, Seneca alledgeth fome notable matters of him, whereof it followeth not that he seneca cleared doth allow of his faults, nor of his feet, as is also to be acknowledged in many places. And from Epicuthere can be nothing observed in the life of Seneca, that shewed him to be an Epicurean or risme. a Libertine. speak evil, saying, that he had wrong to be so tossed and played upon. I think that there is nothing in his Works, be it in his stile, in the method, or in matter, that could be bester performed. Also if they consider what words he useth, how he joyneth them together, what is the end of his discourles, and what the matters are that he treateth of : they will be lefs rigorous unto him. For conclusion, I defire that Seneca's Life, referred to his Writings, do teach four things to my felf, and all others. The one, that being in mean or base condition, we never care to climb up any higher. The other, that if we change a mean effate with another greater, we do remember the former, to converse modeftly with great and fmall. The third, that we never palt for any worldly prosperity, but that we be always afraid of it, until webe toofed by the means of a happy death. And the laft, that in our publick and private convertations, in our thoughts, words, writings, and actions, there there in us the Tove and reverence of true piety and justice.

THE LIFE OF MILTIADES.

Ann. Mund. 3461.

Ilitades an Athenian the fon of Cimon, being one of the chiefelt of his City, as well because of the ancientry of his race, as for his modesty joyned to the glory of his predeceffors, after he had attained to that age in which his Citizens had occasion not onely to hope well of bien, but also to assure themselves, that he would be such a one as they judged him after they knew him : it chanced that the Athenians resolved to send a Colony into Cherronesus. And because many men prepared themselves to go thither, and that there was great suit who thould lead them, they chole fome to go to Delphos, to enquire of the Oracle who should be their Captain: forasimuch as the Thracians at that time did occupy all those parts thereabouts, and they must be driven out by force of Arms. The Prophetes enjoyned the Commissioners Mittiades decreptly to choose Mititades for chief of this People or Colony, the which should prosper in this figured by Orameterprise under his conduct. With this answer Militades accompanied with a chosen company of cle Captain of men, failed unto Cherronesus, and when he came near to Lemnos to subdue the inhabitants of that the Colony. Island, he summoned them without compulsion. They mocking him, answered, They would then yield themselves when Miltiades should come from Athens to Lemnos with a Northern wind, which was full in the faces of them that should come from Athens to Lemnos. Militades having no leafure to tarry there, hoifed fail, and arrived in Cherronefus: and there having in a floor time broken all the Troops of the barbarous people, he made himself Lord of the whole Countrey, built up some Fortreffes, placed his people which he had brought with him in the Countrey, and made them rich, by divers attempts against the self same Countrey-men. Wherein he prevailed as much by his wisdom, as through this good fortune. For after he had through the valiantness of his souldiers overcome the Armies of his enemies, he eftablished his affairs with great equity, and refolved to re-Misside as main in Cherronefus. So he was there as King, although he had not the name, and attained to this King in Cherdegree of honour, as much through his upright administration of justice, as for his sufficiency in rone such Wars. This kept him not from doing his duty unto the Athenians, from whom he was parted: the which was the occasion indeed, that as well those which had sent him thither, as those with whom he embarked, were content he should continue there always Governour. Cherrone fus being brought to this order, he came again to Lemnos, and according to the promife of the inhabitants, he demanded that they would yield up their City unto him : for they promifed to give him their hands when he should come unto them from his Countrey by the North wind. Now (said he) that his Countrey was in Cherrones. The Carians who held Lemnos at that time, seeing things go otherwise then they looked for, and taken not so much by their words, as by the good fortune of their adversaries, durft not make head, but went straight from thence. So all things prospering according to his desire, he brought all the other siles called the Cyclades, to be subject to the A-nneans. At the same time Darius King of Persia having passed all his Army out of Asia into Europe, determined to make War with the Scythians, and made a Bridge over Danuby to pais over his Troops: termined to make war with the Softener, was committed unto the Lords which he had brought with him out of Ionia and Aolia, unto every one of the which he had given perpetual power and Government over their Towns. Supposing by, this policy, easily to bring into their considerates, Greeks that dwelt in Asia, if he gave the Guard of the Towns unto their friends and confederates, Greeks that dwelt in Ajia, it no gave the Guard of the 1 owns unto their triends and controcrates, that could not escape by any means if he were oppressed. As this date, was of the number of the Guards of this Bridge. News being brough by divers heritages that Dirich had but ill becce, and that the Asylvinia's beld high hard to it, he provided the other Guards not reduce the open that the Asylvinia's beld high hard to it, he provided the other Guards not reduce the open that the Asylvinia's beld high hard to it, he provided the other Guards not reduce the open that it Darine and his forces he brought with him was offered to set Greece at liberty, confidering that if Darine and his forces he brought with him was outstated the transfer of the state of t counfell for the ly be done, fince that by cutting off the Bridge, Darius (hould in few days be cut in pieces by the Enemies, or should die for penury with all his Army. Maily agetted unto it: but Islians Miletias brake the neck of it, faying, that the Kingdom of Darius upon whom their authority depended, made difference betwist the good of the affairs of them that commanded, and the people that was under subjection and Government. That if Darius should happen to die, they should be driven our and punished by their Citizens: and therefore that he was of a contrary mind to all the reft, thinking nothing more profitable, then to fee the Kingdom of the Perfiant established. The greater part of them being of his mind, Militade, was afraid, for that there were to many witnesses, that the King should foon be advertised of that which was propounded: wherefore he left Cherrone su, and returned again to Athens. Now though his counfell took no place, yet he was highly commended, having shewed more regard to the good and liberty of all, then to his own particular advancement. For Darius, he being returned out of Europe into Affa, his friends counfelled him to fet upon Greece. Whereupon he armed a Fleet of five hundred Galleys under the charge of Datis and Arta-poernes, giving them two hundred thousand footmen, and ten thousand horse, saying, that he would be even with the Athenians, because that the Ionians had in savour of the Athenians forced the Ciry of Sardia, and killed his Garisons. These two Lieutenants of Darius being arrived in Euboea with their Galkys, they prefently wan Eretria, took all the inhabitants of the Countrey priforms and fent them to the King in Asia. From thence they went into Astrica, and camped in the plain and ich them to the sing in 23111. Here they were and 2311111, and camped in the plant of Marathon, which is within five leagues or thereabouts from Athens. The Athensans aftonibed at fo great a number of Enemies, and so near unto them, knew not of whom to demand aid, but of the Lacedamonians, unto whom they dispatched a very swift footman, a foot Post called Philippides, to advertise them that they had need to fend them aid, and that prefently. In the mean time they choic ten Captains to command and govern their Troops: Militades was one of them. So there was a great disputation among them, to wit, whether they should keep the Walls of their City, or they should go to meet with their enemies to bid them Battle. There was none but Militiades that reasoned, that there was no delaying or protracting of time, but they must make a Camp; and that that would lift up the hearts of the Athenians, when they should fee and behold, that they had a good opinion of their Vertue and Valiantness: and that the Enemies hearts would fail them, when they should understand that so few men came resolutely to fight with them. At that time the Athenians had no aid from any City but from Plates, which fent them a thouland men: who being come, the Army of the Greek; was compounded but of ten thousand men in all, who desired nothing but to fight. That was the cause that Miltiades counsell was preserved above all the other Captains. For the Athenians respecting his valour, caused their Troops to march into the Field, and they camped in a place of advantage. Then the next morning having disposed their footmen at the foot of the mountain, which they had in flanck, they gave charge upon their Enemies couragiously, with a new and sure fashion The Athenians of fight. For there were Trees growing here and there, by means whereof they were under The Autorists covert of the Rocks, and the Trees kept them from being enclosed by the multitude of the Enemiss under the con-

under tue conduct of MilitiaHorsemen. Now although Datis saw that the place did not favour and affect him, yet because he des, fetupon had fo many men, all his defire was to fight, thinking he should win and obtain much, if he their Enemies. Could joyn before the aid of the Lacedamonians came to them. And therefore he made an hundred thousand sootmen, and ten thousand horse to march against them. Then he went to charge the Ather nians, who made excellent proof of their valiantness, considering that they having to fight one a-Ten thousand gainst ten, they made the Perjians siee for life, and so assonished them, that instead of turning back Jen inousand Butter (amp, they faved themselves in their ships. See, here was one of the bravest battles that a man can speak of: for never such a handfull of men overcame so great sorces. Peradventure it will to flight an a man can speak of: for never such a handtun of men overcame to great a man can speak of: for never such a handtun of men overcame to great of so noble a Victory, to the hundred show not be impertinent to shew what reward Militades, had for obtaining of so noble a Victory, to the hundred show not be impertinent to shew what reward Militades, had for obtaining of so noble a Victory, to the find Perfease end that all men may know the better, that all Commonweals have one disposition. As the honours of the people of Rome were in times paft rare and fimple, and by confequent more glorious and to be defired: and now to the contrary more difordered and lefs eftermed: the very tame we find to have been practifed among the Athenians. For all the honour they did unto this Militades, the faviour of Athens and of all Greece, was, that the battle of Marathon having been painted over the Porch called Poecile, his image was fet up the first in rank of all the Captain, with the counte- Militales renance of a man speaking to his fouldiers, and going first to fight. The same people of Athens being warded with honors for this come to be of greater power, and corrupted by the gifts of those which fued for charge and Office in victory. the Commonwealth, caused three hundred statues to be set up for Demetrius the Phalerian.

After this battle, the Athenians gave a Fleet of threefcore and ten Gallies unto Militades, to make War upon the Isles which had aided the Persians. He compelled some by simple commandments, others by force of arms to yield themselves. And not being able by any perswasions to bring the Isle men of Paros to reason (proud, because of their riches) he landed his forces, enclosed the Town with Trenches, and took from the belieged all means either to come by victuals or munition of War: then having fet up his Gabions and Mantelets, he came near the walls. He was at the point to win the Town. when one night (not known by what mischance) there was a great fire seen upon firm land in a wood, which they faw from the Isle. This flame made those that were belieged, and them that lay at the fiege think that it was a fign of the Fleet of the Perfians, to encourage the Parians, and to keep them from vielding up their Town. Hereupon Miltiades fearing that Darius Army by sea was at hand, he set fire of his Mantelets and Gabions, and hoiled fail towards Athens, where he arrived with all the Gallies he carried out: wherewith the people were marvelloully offended. They accused him of treason, that when he might have won Paros by affault, he had taken money of the King, and was returned without fighting; or doing any memorable act. At that time he was fick of the wounds he had received at The people of the fiege of Paros: wherefore not being able to defend himself in person, his brother Stefagor as plead. Athens uned his cause, the which having been debated, he was quit from death, yet condemned to pay a fine of thankfull and unkind unto thirty thousand crowns, to the which they valued the charge of the Army in that journey. And being Milliader, unable to pay fo great a sum, he was committed to the common prison, and there died. Now this matter of Paros was but a cloak; and they spake of it thus for another reason. For the tyranny of Pifistratus, who had altered the estate some years before, was the cause that the Athenians were afraid of Citizens that were in any credit. Miltiades, that had many great and honourable charges, feemed that he could no more be brought to live as a private person, considering also that he was given to this defire to command always. For all the time of his abode in Cherrone fur there was no other Lord but he, and also they called him Tyrant: but just, because he had not gotten this authority by force of Arms, but with the confent of his Citizens, and carried himfelf very modeftly. Now they take and call them Tyrants, which have a perpetual power in a Commonwealth that was free before. Furthermore, The commen-Militades was a very gentle perfon, wonderful affable, and there was not fo mean a man, but might affable, and there was not fo mean a man, but might affable, and there was not fo mean a man, but might take, affable, can be supported to the commendation of Militades. him for one of the bravelt Captains of Greece. Paufanias gi-veth the Perfi-

Ausanias Lacedamonian was a great man, but unconstant in all parts of his life, furnished with vertues, but overwhelmed with vices. It was he that wan that fo famous victory of the Plances. For he being Generall of the Greek Army, this great Lord Mardonism, a Mede by Nation, and fon in law of the King of Persia, the most wife and valiant Captain among all the Persians, followed with two hundred thousand chosen footmen, and twenty thousand horse: he was overcome, the reft of all his Troops driven out of Greece, and himself slain in the field. This victory raised up Pausaniau heart to such a height, that he began to confound the affairs, and to devite great change in his brain. The first shame he received was, that he having offered a Trivet of gold unto the temple of Delphus, of the boory he had gotten upon the enemies, with an Epigram containing in Subfance, that under his conduct the barbarous perple had been overthrown before Placaes, and that acknowledging this victory, he made this prefent unto Apollo: the Lacedemonians razed out these verses, and wrote no other thing but the names of the Towns, through whose aid the Persians had been overcome. After this battle they sent him again with an Army of the allies by fea into Cyprus and Hellefpont, to expulse the Garifons of the barbarous people thence. The which he having fortunately executed, he then grew to be more infolent and am-

For, having taken the City of Byzance by force, and made a great number of Gentlemen of Persia prisoners, among which were many kinfmen of Xerxes, he secretly sent them to him, and gave it out that they escaped out of prison. Gongylas Exterias did accompany them carrying letters to the King, theesseet thereof was this, as Thucydides faith: Pausanias, Captain of Sparia, knowing that the prisoners of Byzanee are thy kinsmen, he sendeth them unto thee for a present, and defeated the different control of the control fireth to be of alliance with thee, and prayeth thee to give him thy daughter in marriage. If thou do it, he promifeth that by his means Sparta and all Greece shall be brought under thy power, Therefore if it please thee to give ear unto it, send him a man expresly with whom he may confer.

The King very joyfull and glad for the delivery of so many friends of his, sent Artabazus presently to Paufanias with letters, in the which he commendeth him, and prayeth him to spare for nothing to bring his promife to país. If he do, that all shall be granted which he demandeth. Paufanian understanding Xerxes mind, refolved resolutely to put his hand to this work : which the Lacede monians miftrufting, having fent for him home, they accused him of treason: whereof he was quit, and yet condemned to pay a fine. This was the cause that they sent him nor again to the Army: but shortly after he returned of his own mind, and by a rash and evil grounded Oration, he easily discovered the thoughts of his heart. Furthermore, he did not onely change his fashion of living after the Laconian manner, but also of his diet and apparell. For he had a royal pomp, training a long Gown, after the fashion of the Medes, followed with a Troop of the Medes and Agyptians for Archers of his guard. His table did so abound in all kinds of dainties, after the manner of the Persians that no man could away withall. He gave no access unto him but very seldom: to them that would speak with him he answered very proudly: and commanded with all cruelty, refusing to return

He went to Colones, which is a place in the Countrey of Treas, and there plotted all his dangerous practifes against his Countrey and himself. When the Lacedamonians had understanding of it, they fent Ambasadors unto him with the Scytala, in the which was written, after their accustomed manner, that if he came not into the City, they would condemn him to death. This Letter aftonithed him, yet hoping to cleape this imminent danger by force of Prefents, and by reason of his credit, he went home into his Countrey, where being, the Ephperes made him to be apprehended, and cast into Prison: for it is lawfull for one of the Ephperes to take the King, and use him so. Nevertheless Paufanias losed himself, being notwithstanding suspected of every man: for they had alwaies this opinion of him, that he had intelligence with Xerxes. There are certain People there called Ilores, and they are a great number of them, and they plow the Lands of the Lacedsmonians, whom they serve as Slaves. It was supposed he did practife with them, under promise to make them free-men. But because they had no pregnant witness to convince him, they thought they must not condema so noble a Person as he by bare conjectures, but rather to tarry till time did reveal it of it felf. In these businesses, a young man called Argitim, who in his infancy had served Pun-If on a tell. In these commences, a young monetains ergroom, who is its intercretage and erved Pan-garias for a Page, having received Letters of him to carry to Artabazas, he doubting left there Argiliae disco-were somewhat therein that might hurt him, for of all those that went into Perssa about the assay wereth Pansa-cot one of them came hark again; he broke onen the Seal and known by the Contract three th not one of them came back again : he broke open the Seal , and knew by the Contents thereof that if he had carried them, he had died for it: also the Letter mentioned matters whereof Paulania; and Xerxes were agreed. Argilius carried these Letters, and put them into the hands of the Ephores. Here is to be noted the moderation and gravity of the Lacedemonians, that would not yet take vantage of this detection, to lay hold upon Pausanias: and resolved not to proceed with rigour, till he first discovered it himself. And therefore they raught Argiliu what they would have him to do.

At Tenare, there is a Temple of Neprune, the priviledge whereof the Greeks hold for facred and inviolable. Argilius fled thither, and fate him down upon the Altar: near unto the which the Ephores made a cave under the ground, from whence one might understand all that any body would say unto Argilisu. Some of the Ephores hid themselves within it. Panfanias understanding that his man was in the priviledge of the Temple, went thither marvellously troubled, and began to ask him how this chance happened. Argilius confessed he had opened the letters, and seen the contents of them. Wherewith Paulanias more troubled then before, began to pray him to fay never a word, and not to betray him who had done him so much good: that if he would do him that favour to help him out of this trouble, he would make him a great man. The Ephores having heard all this talk, they judged that the fureft way was to take him in the City. Whither they being gone, Paulania thinking he had appealed Argilius, and thereby affured his affairs, he returned home to his house: and as they were ready to catch him by the chollar, he perceived by the countenance of one of the Ephores that called him as if he would have spoken with him, that they went about to entrap him. Wherefore doubling his pace newould have spoken with tilling that they with a very mind the fact of mind the Temple of Mindrea, called the followed him, he faved himfelf within the Temple of Mindrea, called the fanctury tollicewisa satter then more man consover man, in the Ephores caused the Church doors preferrly to in the Temple be mured up, and the roof of the Temple to be pulled down, that he might die the fooner with air. It of Minerus, is reported that Panfanias mother being a very old woman, lived at that time: and that the understand. and dieth. ing of the wickedness of her fon, her felf brought the first stone to mure him in there. Behold, how Being of the witchedists of the 10th, first the proof of the great glory he had obtained in the Wars. Being brought half dead out of the Temple, he died immediately. Some would have had his body carried to the Gibbet : others liked not the opinion, and buried him far from the place where he died : from whence he was digged up again, by commandment of an Oracle of Delphor, and put in the fame place be divided.

Or Thrafybulus, he was an Athenian, the fon of one called Lycus. If we should confider his vertue apart, and leave his fortune behind, it may be we should place him first of all others. And to confess a troth, I know no man more faithfull, more constant, more nobly minded, and more loving to his Country, then he. For whereas many have defired (and few executed) to free their Countrey from the hands of one onely Tyrant: it was his fortune to deliver his Countrey from the violence of thirty Tyrants. But it chanced, I know not how, that he which went before all others in vertue, was put down by many others in charge and dignity. In the Wars of Pelaponnefut, Alcibiades did nothing without him, but he on the contrary did many things without Alcibiadet, and wan honour through the goodnels and excellency of his nature. This notwithstanding, all the exploits of War ought to be divided amongstine Chieftains, fouldiers, and fortune: for when Armies meet, that which hash been determined in councillations. fel, is executed by the force and valiantness of the fouldiers that fight. Wherefore the fouldier may pretend right to that which his Generall hath done: Fortune challengeth the better part, and may fay, that the hath in fuch a cafe ftood them in better ftead then all the wildom of the Generall. Even to then, this worthy act of Thrasphilus is proper to himfelf. For as the thirty Tyrants established by the Spartions, that kept the City of stibens in fubjection, had banished part of the Citizens escaped from the Thrasphulus feet War, pur some to death, and iorseited the goods of others: Thrasphulus was the first and onely man field on the that began to make War with them. He was gotten into a strong hold, called Phile, in the territory thirty Tyrants. of Attica, having but thirty men with him in all.

This was the beginning of the health of the Athenians, and the foundation of the liberty unto the goodlieft Commonwealth of Greece. And for as much as the Tyrants fcorned him and his company, it was the cause of their destruction, and of the preservation of Thrasphulus: and their not caring to fet upon him and his, made them stronger by the leifure they had given them. The which should teach all to remember this rule : that we must never despise our enemy. And so it is not spoken in vain, that the mother of a coward doth never weep. For all his fame that went of him, many did not joyn with him: for then those that were best affected, made War with the Tyrants more with their tongue then with their hands. From Phile Thrasphulus went to the Port of Pyras, and did fortifie the Forttes called Mynichia: the which the Tyrants did affault, but they were repulfed with fuch shame, that they fuddenly retired to the Town with loss of Arms and baggage. In this action, Thrafybulus shewed himself no less wife then valiant: for he commanded his men to touch none that made no refittance, thinking it reasonable that the Citizens should pardon one theother: and there was not a man of them hurt, but those that affaulted them. He would strip none of the dead, nor suffer any thing to be taken from them, but their arms and victuals which he needed. Critias, the chief of all the Tyrants, having fought very valiantly against Thrasphulus, was slain at the second affault. After he was dispatched. Panfanian King of Sparia came to the aid of the Athenians, and made peace betwixt Thraffbulu and those which kept the City, with these conditions, that the thirty Tyrants, and the ten new Governors, The thirty Ty-which had committed as many cruclties as the Tyrants themselves, should be banished, and their goods rant bandhed, forfeited, without touching any other Citizens: and that the foveraignty and government of theeftate as allo the ter

new governors should be restored again unto the people.

It was another fine device of Thrafybulus, that after he had pacified all matters, and obtained great credit in the City, he made a law that no man should be called in question nor troubled for things that were patt, and that was called Amneftia, or law of Oblivion. But he was more careful A law to forto keep it, then to publish it. For some of his followers in his exile, complotted to kill some that Carefull execution of good were pardoned: but he ftopped it by open proclamation, and kept his promife. To recompense thele io many good deeds of his, the people gave him a Crown of two branches of Bayes, the which got him no envy, but great glory: because he had obtained it through the good will of his Citizens, and not by force. It was wifely faid of Pittacm, one of the feven Sages: when the Mitylenians: gave him many thouland of days work of lands, I pray you, faid he, give me not that thing which is envited of many men, and defired of all the world: of all thole I will onely take but a Contentation hundred days work, which shall make proof of my moderation, and of your good affection: for with a little. finall presents do continue long, but we are no long time owners of great riches. So then Thraspe imal precents of contenting himfelf with this Crown, he fought for no more, and did think that no man was more honoured then he. Shortly after, he being arrived in Sicilia with a Fleet the which he commanded. his fouldiers were not carefull to keep good watch in his Camp: upon which occasion, the batbarous people that were besieged, having by night made a fally out of the Town upon him, they surprise Thrasphalm

Uring the Wars of Peloponneshie, Conon Athenian began to deal in the Affairs of the Commonwealth, and did great fervice: for he was chosen Colonel of the infantry, then Admirall, in which charge he did many goodly exploits. By means whereof he grew to be of fingular reputation amongst all men, and had the Government of all the Isles: during which time he wan Phares a Colony of the Lacedamonians. Towards the end of the War of Peloponnesus, at what time Lyfander overcame the Army of the Athenians upon the Sea coast which they call the River of the Goat, he had then charge of certain Galleys, howbeit

he was not at the Battle, which was cause that all came to nought, for he was a Wise and Valiant Captain: infomuch that it was in every mans mouth, that if he had been there, the Athenians had not was befieged, he fought not to hide himself to live in fafety, but thought how he might help his Citireth the prereth the pr and Governour of Ionia and of Lydia, into whole favour he infinuated himself, but with great trou-Country, beble and much danger. Now when the Lacedamonians, after they had subdued the Athenians, instead fore his own of maintaining the alliance made with Artaxerxes, had for the Agelhaut to make War in Afia, through private fairty, the perfusation of Tifaphernes, which had for faken the King (of whom heretofore he was greatly be. loved) and joyned with the Lacedamonians: Pharnabazus was appointed Lieutenant Generall of the Army of the Persians to make head against Agestians. But in truth Conon commanded all, and nothing was done without his advice and counfell. It was he that brake the most part of all the intentions and attempts of this great Captain Agessians, being a thing certain enough, that is Conon had not opposed himself, the Lacedamonians had taken all Asia from the King, unto the Mountain Taurus, Hereupon Agessians being sent for home by the Ephores, because the Baotians and Athenians had proclaimed War against Sparta, Conon left not to be ever near to the Lieutenants of the King of Perfia, and did them great fervice.

Tissaphernes withdrew himself from the Court of Persia, the which all men perceived well enough but the King, with whom he was in great credit and estimation, though he was no more his servant. And it is not to be marvelled at, if Artaxerxes could believe nothing, remembring himself that by Tiffaphernes means he overcame his brother Cyrus. Conon being fent by Pharnabazus unto the King to accuse this Tissaphernes, he being come to the Court, came first to the Captain of the Guard, called Tiehrenstes, according to the custom of the Persians. He is chiefest of all the Officers of the Kingdom, and no man can be suffered to come near the King to speak with him, without his leave and licenfe. He being intreated by Conon to let him go unto the Prince: I am contented, faid he, but confider if thou be determined to speak with him thy self, or to deliver thy mind by writing that thou would fay unto him. For if thou come to his presence, thou must kneel to the King : and if thou think that grievous unto thee, thou mayest execute thy commission by my means, as well as by thine own mouth As for me, answered Conon, it shall be no troublesome thing to me, to do the King that honour that shall please thee : but I am asraid to do my City dishonour, if I do a thing proper to the barbarous people, and unfit for that City which was wont to command other Nations. So then he delivered his meliage in writing: which when the King had feen, he was fo moved with the report of fo great a person, that he judged Tissaphernes his enemy, decreed War against the Lacedemonians, and suf-fered Conon to make choice of such a man as he would, to distribute the money necessary to defray the charge of this War. Conon made this answer, that this election pertained nothing to him, but to the King that knew his fervants best : yet in his opinion, this charge should be best bestowed upon Pharrang that knew his retrains och . Jesus prefems to the maritime Towns, to command the Cyprioss, Phenicians, and others dwelling upon this coast to put Galleys in readiness, and to Arm a Fleet that might keep the Seas next Summer, under the conduct of Pharnabazus and of Conon, who had so The Lacedamonians being advertised thereof, were amazed, perceiving well that they were to make another manner of War then with the barbarous people. For they faw that they must needs come to fight against a valiant and wife Captain, having the Kings treasure in his hands, and that had as much ngnt against a valuant and whic caprain, naving the longs treature in its nands, and that had as much and better direction and forces then they. With this thought they gathered together great flore of and better direction and forces then they. With this thought they gathered together great flore of fine the spar Cnidos, gave them battle, made them flee, took flore of Galleys, and funk a great number of them.

1681. By means of this victory, Athen; and all Greece, subject to the dominion of the Lacedemonians, were fer at liberty. Conon returned again to his Country with part of these Galleys, built up again the walls of Athens, and of the haven of Piras, which had been overthrown by Lyfander, and prefentions ed his Citizens with thirty thouland crowns which Pharnabaxus had given him. But that which haped his chizens while the ty thousand crowns which Final naturals had given him. Due that when his pench oftentimes unto other men chanced also unto Coton, that is, to have less courage in prosperity, then in advertiny. For now that he had overcome the Fleet of the Peloponnessan, thinking he had taken fufficient revenge of the wrongs received by his Countrey, he began to embrace in his mind imaginations too high for his carriage: although this was good and commendable in his enterprife, that he had rather make his own Countrey great and rich, then the King of Perfia. Therefore he being now grown into wonderfull credit, not onely amongst the barbarous people, but also amongst all the Cities of Greece, after this battle of Cristor, the began underhand to practife the means to restore Ionian and Lalia to be subject again to the Commonwealth of the Athenians. His practises being discovered, Tiribazus Governor of Sardus, fent to pray him to come to him, to be fent in Ambassage to the King. Comen straight obeying his commandment, he was no sooner arrived, but he was straight claps up in prison, where he remained some time. Some write that he was carried to the King, and died in Perfia. But Dion the Hiftorian, to whom we give great credit in that he treateth of the affairs of Perfia, reporteth, that Conen faved himself, leaving it indoubt whether Tiribaxus was privy to it, or that he knew not of it.

Phicrates the Athenian was famous, not fo much for his divers exploits, or for the greatness of them, as for his Miniary Discipunce and the state of War, that they compared him unto the bravelt men of his time, and they tain of War, that they compared him unto the bravelt men of his time, and they did not fet him behind any of those that had gone before him. He had been in many Wars, had commanded Arthies oftentimes, he never had misfortune by his own fault, he ever overcame by Wifdom: his Understanding reaching to far, that he brought in many good things never feen before in the Art Military :
and made some of them better that were in tife. He altered the Arms of Footmen: Iphiomer skill

He made the Parilians greater by half, and the Swords longer. He changed also the Corillers, and instead of Iron and Copper, he made them of Carvais well wrought together, which made the Souldiers much lighter; for being eited of that welght, they had means to defend themselves minbby against hows, and were ready befiels to give charge upon the Tenny. He made War with the Thrailpain, and re-tstablished Southers again in his Ringdom, an Ally of the Athenians. Being at Corimb, he observed so good Discipline in his Artny, that they never faw any Souldiers in Greece. better disposed, nor more obedient to their Colonel then they were. He did the like in Gypras, whither the Athenians for him of purpose to help Engoras, and would not depart thence before he had first subdeed all the file, for the which the Athenians and would not depart thence before he had first subdeed all the file, for the which the Athenians and would not depart thence before he had first subdeed all the file, for the which the Athenians and would not depart thence before he had first subdeed all the file, for the which the Athenians and would not depart thence before he had first subdeed all the file, for the which the Athenians and would not depart thence before he had first subdeed all the file. nians wan great honour. In thele buintiffes, War fell out beiwint the Persians and Agyptians. They of Albens were allies of Artaxerxen, and the Spartans 190k part with Agpr. King Agfilam did greatly invade the Persians, and carried great boones away. Chabrisa confidering that, and giving no place to Agessiam, went of his own head to aid the Agyptians, who made him their Admiral, and gave the charge of the Army by land unto Agessiam. Then the Lieutenants of the King of Reffig lent unto Athens, to complain that Chabrias made War with the Agyptians against their King. The Atheniam lent for Chabriss immediately to appear in person, threatning him to condemnhim to death, if he were not there by the day appointed. The mediage made him to come a-Bain to Assens, where he tarried no longer, then needs he must. For the Citizens bare him no great good will, because he carried himself to drasely, and would be so merry, that the people envied him. This vice regneth commonly in those great and free Towns, that glory is ever accompanied with envy, and they willingly speak ill of them whom they see to be great: and to be short, the poor cannot abide wealthy and rich men. Therefore Chabrias did absent himself out of the City as much as he could possible, and he was not alone in that, for almost all the chiefest of the City did the like; thinking themselves fafe from the teeth of the envious, fo long as they were far off from the fight of their Citizens. Therefore Conon lived for the most part of his time in the Isle of Cyprus, Ibbicrates, in Timaejes, Timosheus in Leibos, Cares in Sygera. As for Cares, he was not to be likened in any respect unto the others, in exploits, nor in manner of life: and yet he was honoured in the City of Athena, and

As for Chabries, he died in the War of the allies in this manner. The Athenians made War with the Islanders of Chie, at which time Chabries had no charge of the Army by fea. Norwithlanding he had more authority then all the Captains, and the fouldiers effeemed him more, then any other of the Commanders; which was the cause of his death. For striving to enter the first into the haves, and commanding the Pilot to row right thither, it was his deftruction: for being moored there within, the other thips followed him not. Whereupon the enemies compaffed him in : but as he fought valiantly, his Galley being beaten by the four of another yelfel, began to leak, and to link to the bottom. He feeing there was no way, for him to escape, because the Fleet of the Athenians was too far off to receive him in, if he should have attempted to have swom, he had rather die then leave his Arms, and forsake the Galley which carried him. The others, they took another courfe, and faved themselves by ftrength of their Arms. But he efteening an honeft death to be more excellent then a shamefull life, fighting very near, was killed by the enemies with Darts.

For he was an eloquent man, die dation of Tiligent, painfull, expert in Military Discipline, and a great Politician. He had mobbeus and executed great things, whereof the most notable are these, to wit the subdued his exploits. the Olynthians and Byzantines: he wan the City of Samos, the fiege whereof in the former Wars had stood the Athenians in the fum of twelve hundred talents. He delivered it unto the people freely without any charge to them. He made war with King Corps, and brought of the booty he had gotten there unto the Treasury, the like sum of twelve hundred talents. He also raised the siege that was before Cyfica, and went with Agefilam to the aid of Ariobarzanes, of whom having received money, he had rather his Cirizens should buy Towns and Lands, then to carry it home to his lodging. Therefore he joyned Ericthone and Selfas to the Signiory of Athens. Afterwards having charge of the Army by Sea, he invaded Pelapannefus, fpoiled all the territory of Sparta, and had all their Ships in chafe: He brought the Corcyreans under the subjection of the Athenians , and drew into their alliance the Epirots , Athamanes , and Chaonians , and all the people upon that Sea coaft. The which made the Lacedamonians leave their fo long old quarrell, and of their own good wills let the Athenians have the principality of the Sea: treating peace with these conditions, that the Athenians should be Generals upon the Sea,

This Victory did so please the Athenians, that there was then first of all an Altar built to the common Peace, and they did ordain a Pillow should be made for that goddess. Furthermore, that fuch a glorious Act should remain for perpetuity, they raised up a Statue Timubeus hounto Timetheus in the Market-place, by ordinance of the people, which was an honour that noured with a her family from the father, to wir, that the people having granted a Statue for the father, flatue, they should also give one to the Son. By this means the Statue of the Son so for freshly fur up, renewed the memory of the Father. Now Timeshess being very old, dealing no more in affairs of the Common-wealth, they began afresh to torment the Athenians of all files. Sames and Hellespone shrunk back and revolted. Philip King of Macedon, who began to wax great , plotted wonderfull things in his head. Charcs was fent against him to make head. But they thinking him not fufficient to repulse Philip, they therefore fent Mensilhers the Son of Iphicrates, Son in law to Timothess, and made him Colonel, gave him the charge of the affairs of the wars, having for his Counsellours, his Father, and Father-in-law, brave Caprains, wife and expert men to direct him with their counfel: their authority being fo great, that every man hoped that all that was lost should be recovered again by their means. They pointing for Samos, Chares that had heard news of it, failed up and down that coaft, to the end nothing should be done in his absence. Drawing near to the Isle, a storm arose, and to defend themselves against it, the two old Captains strake fail, and hulled, going on further into the Sea. Chares to the contrary upon a head, not respecting them that had seen more then he, held on his course, thinking to have found an occasion as he wished, and some sewell to Timesthesse as to Iphicrates, that they should follow him. But having had evill fuccels, and loft many of his Ships, he fell back again to that very place from whence he timothesis came, and fent letters to the people of Athens of this effect, that he had easily taken Samos, wrongfully according to if Timothesis and Iphicrates had not forfaken him at his need. Upon this acculation they were cufed and confummoned to appear in person by this bold people, suspitious, unconstant, enemy and demned. thious of another mans greatness, and are charged to be Traitours to the Common-wealth. Timothem was condemned, and a fine fet upon his head of fixty thousand Crowns.

Inhierates constrained by the importunity of his unthankfull Citizens , went for a time to Chalspinerates Continue death , the People repenting their Sentence , abated nine parts of the cis. After Timebess death, the reoper repenting their sentence, abated nine parts of the fum above named, and commanded Comms, the Son of the deceased, to furnish six thousand Crowns for the reparation of a pane of the Wall. Here is to be noted a wonderful revolution, of the Affairs of this World: for the young Son was constrained at his own charges (to the great dishonour of his House) to repair the Walls, the which his Grand-statter (Jume had made up with the Booty gotten of the Enemies. We could allede many examples of the modelty and wildom of Timeshess: but we will add for the end a matter, whereby may be easily conjectured how much he was eftermed of the Greeks: Being young he was accused, and brought before the Judge, whereupon his friends and familiars came out of all parts into Athens to defend him, and 2monest others the Tyrant Pason, who was at that time the mightiest Lord of all Greece. This Ty. rant was never affured in his own Countrey without his Guard, and yet he came without any Train to Athens, efteeming fo much his Hoft Timothem, that he had rather hazard his life, then fail his friend in time of necessity. Notwithstanding this, shortly after Timothem made War with Jason, by Timusbear pre- the commandment of the People, thinking that to obey his Countrey, and to maintain the right of the ferreth the communament or the recopie, similaring that to obey in Southerfy, and to maintain the right of the common profit fame, is a more devout thing, then to favour a private friend. After this laft Age, which took away before private Iphicrates, Chaptins and Timushesse, Captains of Athens, they could never find in the Common-friendfulp.

THE LIFE OF DATAMES.

Ann. Mund. 3642.

Datames 2 wil Captain.

Prefently enter into the Life of a most valiant and wife Captain . 2mong all the barbarous; Hamilear and Hannibal of Carthage excepted. We will speak somewhat more amply of this man, for that the most part of his Exploits are little known, and also because he had obtained his Victories not fo much by force of Arms, as by his wildom: a vertue in the which he did furpals all the men of his time. But this cannot be judged, unless we make him known in all particulars. Datames the Son of Camifares a Carian , and of a Scythian, was at the beginning a Souldier of the Guard of the Palace of direction in the Wars, and for that he had done many good Services unto the King, was made Governour of Cilicia, near unto Cappadacia, where the Lencofyrians dwell. As for Datames, following the Wars, he made proof of his valous in the War which Artastrati had againft the Cadacians: where many men being flain on both fides, he fought to valiantly, the his Extra trains. that his Father being killed, he had his Authority and place of Governour of Cilicia. He Danner by his shewed himself no less valiant in War, then Antophrodates did by the Kings commandnortitude and valour obtain ment unto those that had rebelled. For, by the direction of Datames, the Enemies that were eth the place now entred into the Perfians Camp , were repulled , and all the Army of the Kings in falehis Father had, ty : the which was the cause of his calling and advancement unto higher Charges. There was at that time in Paphlagonia a Governour called Thyse, descended of an ancient Race of one Pylamenes , whom Homer faith , was slain by Patroclus in the War of Troja. He not regarding the Kings will and commandment , who therefore refolved to make War with him, and gave the charge of it unto Datames, Coulin-germane to Thym. By reason of Kindred, Datames would prove, by all means he could, to draw his Kiniman to fome conformity, before he took Arms: he went unto him without any Train, little thinking that his friend would have laid any Ambulh for him, but he had almost been taken tardy, for Thyse fought to surprise him, and

And although that in the pursuit of this War, he was cometh Thyus, forfaken of Ariobarzanes Governour of Lydia, of Ionia, and of all Phrygia, yethe let not and leadeth to go further: he took Thym Prisoner with his Wife and Children, and then very carefully to the Court. took order that no man but himself should carry news of it to the King. So following that purpose, without any mans privity he arrived at the Court, and the next morning apparelled Three (a tall man and of a terrible grim look, being black haired, and wearing his hair long) with a great Robe, such as great Lords use to wear. He apparelled himself like a Countrey man, in a Lion tawny Coat, with a Cloak of divers colours, and an Hunters Hat . having in his right hand a Club, and in his left hand a Leace, unto the which Thyus was tied. who went before, as if he had led fome favage Beast he had taken in the Chase a hunting. They all ran to fee this new Monster thus difguifed, and those which knew Thyus went presently and told the King of it, who at the first would believe nothing, but fent Pharnabazus to see what it was. So when he had told him what had happened, he made this pomp come in prefently, and the King took great pleasure to see it, but specially to see so mighty a Prince beyond all hope to subdued. Therefore after he had given sumptuous presents unto Datames, he sent him unto the Army that was leavied under the conduct of Pharnabazus and Tithraustes , to make War in Agypt.

and ordained that he should have as much Authority as they. Now after that the King had fent for Pharnabazus, all the charge of the War was committed to Datames. Who being greatly occupied about Leavies of men to go into Agypt, he received Letters from the King, commanding him to invade a Lord called A/pis, who held Cataonia, a Province joyning near to Cappadocia beyond Cilicia, a Mountain-Countrey, well furnished with Fortresses, that despiled the King, and made Invasions upon the Provinces thereabouts, spoiling Victuals and all things else that were carried to the King. Though Datames was far from that place, and had other Affairs of great importance in hand, yet he determined to obey the King, and suddenly imbarqued himself with a small number of resolute men, thinking (that which came to pass that with a few men he should sooner surprize a man not dreaming of any such matter, then with a great Army to go and affail him. He being arrived in Cilicia, landed, then marched day and night over Mount Taurus, and came to the place where he would be : he enquireth for Aspis, and understandeth that he was not far off a hunting. But as he stayed for his coming, Alpis knew that he was come, and immediatly disposed of his Pifidians and others of his Train to make head. Datames knowing this resolution, takes his Arms, made his men march, and Datamestaketh galloped to the place where Afpis was, who feeing him come with fuch a fury, he loft his coudeth him Prideth him Prirage to defend himself, and presently yeelded. Datames made him to be bound, and sent him soner to the by Mithridates to the King. Hereupon Artaxerses confidering better what he had done, draw-Kinging his Lieutenant far from his Army, to fend him in Commiltion about a matter of less consequence, being angry with himself, sent a Messenger to the Camp, thinking Datames was not yet gone from thence, to tell him that he should not go. But before this Messenger came to the Army, he met them by the way that brought $Af_{P}is$. This so sudden execution wan Datames the Kings good favour, but made him very much hated of the Courtiers, feeing one onely man more made of then all the rest, which was the cause that they all journed together to deftroy him. Pandates Treasurer of the Spare, and Datames friend, did advertise him by earlies Letters, that he stood in great danger, if any finister Fortune happened whilest he should command the Army in Egypt, that it is the custom of Kings to impute all misfortunes to their Servants that chance in their Affairs, and to attribute the good success unto themselves: and this makes them very eafily incline to the extermination of them, of whom report is made, Datamee being that they have not done that which was committed to their charge : and as for him, that envied because he should so much the more stand in fear, because those who could do most with the King, of his vertues, were his greatest Enemies. Datames having received these Letters in his Camp, and know- he forsaketh ing that they carried truth with them , he refolved to forfake the King : which doing , not- the King. withstanding he committed no breach of his fidelity. For he lest Androcles Magnesian Generall of the Army, and for himself he went with his men into Cappadocia; afterwards he wan Papklatonia which was hard by it, without shewing himself either friend or enemy of the King. He fecretly contracted friendship with Ariobarzanes, assembled Forces, and gave the guard of the Towns of War unto those he intrusted best, but the winter did let him that his Affairs went not forward. He understandeth that the Pifidians did leavy fome Troops to set upon him, which caused him to send his Son Aridam before with an Army. The young man being slain at an Encounter, the Father marched right thither with his men, hiding his grief as much as he could possible, because he desired to meet with his Enemies, before those that followed him should hear of his loss, being afraid left the news of the death of this young Lord should kill their hearts. So being come to the place where he pretended, he camped in such fort, that the multitude of his Enemies could not inclosehim, nor keep him from coming to fight when he thought good. He brought with him Asthridates his Father-in-Law, who was Colonell of the Horsemen. He perceiving the Affairs of his Son-in-law in fo poor an effate, for fook him to go yeeld himfelf to the Enemies.

A fine Strata-

Datames being told of it, judged that his Souldiers, if they once perceived that his Father-inlaw had for faken him, they would also follow his example wherefore to prevent all, he gave it out that Mithrobarzanes was gone by his commandment, pretending to yeeld themselves to the Enemies, to the end with more ease and advantage to cut them in pieces; and therefore that there was no reason to leave such a man so far from them, but they must needs follow him with fpeed. So that they standing to it lustily, the Enemies could not relist, considering they should be charged within and without their Camp. So having thought that the best way in the World. he marched into the Field with his Troops, and followeth Mithrobarzanes, who did but newly yeeld themselves to the Enemies, when Datames appeared, who put out the fignall of Battell The Pifidians troubled with this strange sight, did suspect that Mithrobarzanes and his would betray them, and that they were come of purpose to do them some mischief. Thereupon they vehemently gave Charge upon these Traytours, who not knowing what to think of such a Charge, were constrained to fight against them unto whom they had yeelded themselves, and to return unto them whom they had forfaken. But the one and the other not knowing them any whit, in a flort time thele wicked men were cut in pieces. So withall Datament elterth upon the Pifdians who made head against him, passed thorow them, and brake them at the sirst Charge, pursued them that fled, flew a great number of them, and was master of their Camp. Note here how wifely (and all done at one time) he punished the Traytors, and put his Enemies to flight, turning that to good, which was devised for the overthrow of him and his. This is the most brave and most speedy executed Stratagem of a Chieftain in Wars, that can be found in Histories.

The Son betrayeth the Father.

Notwithstanding that , this great Person was forsaken of his eldest Son Scismas, who went to the King to advertise him that his Father was revolted. This troubled Artaxerxes greatly, knowing that he had to deal with a valiant and wife Captain, who boldly did fet upon any Enterprize with discretion. Thereupon he sent Antophradates into Cappadocia, whom Datames took pains to go and meet, to prevent him that he should not win the Straight of Cilicia. But being long affembling his Forces, and that hope being frustrate, he chose with those tew men that followed him fuch a place, that his Enemies could not inclose him, nor pass, but that he should shut them up in very unwholsome places, nor hurt him when he listed to joyn in fight. Now though Antophradates understood somewhat of that, yet he made account that it was more expedient for him to joyn then to flee from the Lift, having fo great Forces, He had twenty thousand Horse, and an hundred thousand Footmen, which they call Gardates, with three thousand Slings of the same name. Furthermore, he had eight thousand Cappadocians, ten thousand Armenians, five thousand Paphlagonians, ten thousand Phrygians, five thousand Lidians, and about three thousand Aspenasans and Pisidsans, two thousand Cilicians, as many Captarians, and three thousand Greeks in pay, besides a great number of light armed men. Against this world of Forces, Datames could hope no more but in his direction, and in the commodity of the place where he camped, for he had not the twentieth part fo many men. Yet trufting to himself, to the place, and to the valour of his men, he came to fight, and put to the Sword many thousands of his Enemics, having lost of his fide but one thousand of his men. For this cause he fet up the next day in the Field a fign of triumph where the Battell was fought. So being removed from thence, as he was the weaker in number of men, he to the contrary remained Victor in all Skirmishes and Fights, and never came to hands but he put his Enemy to the worse: in the which he had oftentimes very good fuccefs, because he knew all the ways, and did wisely confider his Affairs. Antophradates feeing the King loft more in these Wars, then he got, he perswaded Datames to tall to agreement, and to make his peace with the King. Though Datames had no great truft in that, yet he accepted the condition, and faid he would fend Ambassadours unto Artaxerxes. And thus the War of the King ended against Datames; and for Antophradates , he retired into Phrygia.

Datames way But the King being vexed to the heart against Datames, considering that he could not preagainst Trea- vail against him by Arms, sought to make him away by Treason. Datames looked warily to his ways, and avoided many Ambushes. As on a time, having understanding that some pretending to be his friends, had laid a plot for him, although his Enemies had given him intelligence of it, yet he thought, that as it was not a thing lightly to be believed, fo was it not altogether to be discredited: whereupon he resolved to try whether the report was true or false. Therefore he set forward to the place where it was told him this Ambush was laid : but he chose amongst his men one that was of his height, he gave him his Furniture, and made him march in the Rank which he was wont to hold. He on the otherside apparelled like a Souldier, went with the Archers of the Guard. Those which lay in Ambush, deceived by the order and Furniture, affoon as they faw their time, began to fet upon the supposed Da tames. But the right Datames had warned them before with whom he marched . to be ready to do all as he did. He feeing then these Traytors running, he threw Darts at them, and fo did all those that were in his Company, fo that the other fell to the ground before they could come near him whom they would furprife. Now notwithstanding all this, this so gainst Datames, wary and subtill Captain was in the end betrayed by the deceit of Mithridates the Son of Ariobarzanes, who promifed the King to do the deed, so that he would afterwards suffer him to do what he thought good, without being called in question any manner of way.

The King consented unto it, and gave his hand upon it after the custome of the Persians, to make him more affured. Mithridates having the Kings word, made thew to be fworn Enemy unto Artaxerxes, he gathered Troops together, and by means treateth friendship with Da- The manner same, he entreth with a main Army into the Kings Country, befregeth and taketh Fortreef of this ideal fes, carrieth away great Booty, he giveth part of it to his Souldiers, he fendeth the reft unto Strangeme. Datames, and delivered many fortreffes and Holds into his hands. So having continued this course a reasonable time, Datames began wholly to believe that Mithridates had undertaken a War which he would never leave, and this Traytor gave him great occasion to think so. For fearing lest Datames would mistruft fome Ambush, he fought not to speak with him, nor went about to meet together. hat without enterview he entertained his Alliance fo finely, that these two men seemed both one, not so much for mutuall benefit, as for a common harred conceived against the King. When he saw his Snare well laid, he wrote to Datames, that time required they should affemble great Forces to make War against the King, and if he thought good, he would appoint a place where they might one see another, and confer together. Datames found this advice good, and fo they appointed a day to meet another, and other they might speak personally one with the other. Some days before Mithria Pine appoint these appointments on the place, seconded with another in whom he put great trust, he hid Poignards separate of enterted in divers places, and did carefully mark the place where they were laid. The day being come of view together. their talking together, both of them fent men to discover the place; and to fearth one the other, betaufe they should be without Weapons. That being done, they enter into talk, and after they had spoken some time together, they departed ! so that Datames was gone a good way off. And as for Mithridates, because he went to his men (to give no occasion of ill thought) he cometh to the same place again where they had fooken together; and fate him down in a place where there was a Poignard hidden, feigning to be weary and to refresh himself a little. Then he sent for Datames under colour that he had forgotten to tell him fomething. In the mean time he took the Poignard out of the place Distant's travwhere it was hidden, drew it, and put it naked under his Robe. And feeing Detames, told him they revoully must go a little aside, and that he had discovered a place directly over against them very fit to camp dered by Miin He began to shew him the place with his finger : and as Datames turned to see what it was, this thritage. Traytor stabbed him with his Poignard, and made an end of killing of him before any of his men could come to help hint. See here how through presence of friendship he was surprised, who had entrapped formany others by his valiant Direction, but none by Treason.

THE LIFE OF H & M I L C A R.

Ann. Mund. 1700.

Ant. Christ.

Amilear the Son of Hannibal, firnamed Barcas , a Carthaginian Captain, being very young, began to command an Army that was in Sicilia, in the end of the first War of Africk. Before his coming thither the Carthagin-ans had very ill fuccels both by Sea and Land: but so soon as he led the Army, he never gave place to the Enemy, and gave him no advantage to hurt him, but to the contrary, he found many an occasion to draw them to fight, wherein he had the vantage. Which being done, although the Carthaginians had well-near loft all that they held in Sicilia, yet he kept the City of Erix fo well, as it feemed that there had never been War made in that Quarter. In the mean time the Carthaginians having loft a Battell at Sea near unto the Illes Agaies, against Carulus Luttatius a Roman Consull, they determined to sea near unto the like a season, sand and the charge unto Hamilear to treat of Peace. For his part he defired nothing leave Arms, and gave all the charge unto Hamilear to treat of Peace. but War : yet feeing his Town in want of Money and Means, and in danger to fink under their burthen, he concluded that they must make Peace. Yet so notwithstanding he resolved with himself, that as foon as all matters were pacified, he would make War again, and fet upon the Remans, either to make them Lords of all , or elfe to compell them to be subject. With this mind he entred into Parley of Peace, where he shewed himself so stout, that as Gatalus declared he would agree to nothing, before Hamilton and his Souldiers, which had kept Erix, had laid down their Arms, and nothing, before Hamiltar and his Souldiers, which had kept Erix, had laid down their Arms, and feeth to yeeld not general of Sicilia; he made answer, that he would rather die in the ruines of his Countrey, unto dihonou-were gone out of Sicilia; he made answer, that he would rather die in the ruines of his Countrey, rable Condition then to return home with such shame; and thar Honour would not suffer him to yeeld up his Arms to ons of Peace. his Enemies, which his Countrey had put into his hands to be imployed against them. So Carrier

But when Hamilear was arrived at Carthage, he faw matters go far otherwife then he hoped for. let him go with this obstinate resolution. For during the long Wars against the Enemies abroad, there was mischief sprung up among them within: which went on fo fiercely, that Carthage was never in lo great danger but when it was together deftroyed. First of all, the mercenary Souldiers that had been in the Wars against the Romans, to the number of twenty thousand: they rebelling, made all Africk rise, and they befieged mans, to the number of twenty mountains: they receiving, make an applied in S, and they orneged Carthoge. The Carthoginians being greatly afraid of fo many evils, they demanded aid of the Romans, which they granted. But in the end, when all was thought to be in a desperate case, they chofe Hamilear their Captain-Generall, who did not onely drive the Enemies far from the Town, Hamiltar over - which were in number above an hundred thousand fighting men, but he did also shut them up in such Straights, that the most part of them died of famine, and the rest were slain. Furthermore, he brought Economics of his the Cities which had revolted, under the obedience again of Carthage, and amongst others Utica and Hipp:na, two of the strongest Cities of Africk. But not staying there, he extended the limits of the Seigniory of Carthage, and pacified all Africk in fuch fort, that it feemed there had been no

Now having done all things according to his mind, he bearing ill will to the Romans, and hoping to be revenged; to find a more easie way to draw them to War, he practifed fo well that he was cho-Mimilest the fee Generall, and they fent him with an Army into Spain, whither he carried with him his Son Haragainst the Ro. nibal nine years old, and another fair young Gentleman called Haldrubal, whom many judge to be mans, and fent loved of Hamilear otherwise then was fit for honest men. For there were many always that could not contain themfelves from speaking evil of this great Captain. Which was the cause that the Governour of Hashrubal did forbid him to come any more to Hamilton, who afterwards gave him his Daughter in Marriage, so that they began again to meet together. For by the custome of the Countrey they could not forbid a Son-in-law, to frequent with his Pather-in-law. We have made mention of Hafdrubal, because that after Hamilear was slain, he was made chief of the Army, which did great Exploits under his Conduct. Even so he was the first, that by Presents and Gifts corrupted the ancient Manners of the Carthaginians. After his death, Hannibal had the charge of the Army, with the cohlent of all the men of War. As for Hamiltan, he having paffed the Sea, entred into Spain, and did great things there with good frecefs. He subdued many warlike Nations, enriched all Africk with Horfes, with Arms, with men, and with Money. As he had thought to have transported the Hamiltar flain. War from thence into Iraly, nine years after his coming into Spain, he was flain in a Battell against the Vettons. The deadly have he bare unto the Romans, feemeth to have kindled the fecond War with Africk, For his Son Hannibal was brought to this pass, by the continual adjurations of his Father, that he had rather destroy himself, then to fail his help against the Romans.

10. Last line.

As much as the fail of their Ship should cover. That is Thefew his Ship, wherein he went to Crete, he returned in it; and which they yearly sent to Delphor.

Made facrifice to Fear the Goddess. The affinity of the words in Greek, have made some think it should be Pheabus, Apollo: bur 'its most likely it is Fear: For the Ancients (as the Indian snow, Bacrifice to the Devil that he may not hurt them) used to sacrifice to such things, as, they thought were adverse to them, or hindred them in their designes: So Thesew here to the Goddes Fear.

The Village of Eleutheres. A Town in the Province of Athens, bounding on Boetia.

Sirnamed his wife Proferpina. The original hath it Persephone.

Was called Arithmaidas. Some call him Artemidas.

36. 10. As Plato faith. In his third Book of the Laws.

Jupiter Syllanian. In this Retra, or Statute-Oracle here mentioned, there are in the Original several Greek words, as Gorian and Gamodan, which all Interpreters have past by, not knowing what they mean. As Plato faith. In his Book of the Commonwealth. Geometricall reasons which in the Mathematiques flow from true and necessary Propositions, have such a force of Demonstration, that as Cicero faith, They may be rightly faid, not to perswade onely, but to compel.

The Cup Cothen, It was a small earthen Cup and full of concavities and bunches,

As Aristotle faith. In the seventh of his Politicks, c. 17.

To give their hand to yield. The meaning is, When they were conquer'd, they held up their fore-finger in fign of yeelding; as elfewhere, to give the herb, to pluck up some grass, to give it to the Conquerour.

By means of Lyfander. In the Original it is , Alexander, or rather Lyfander. Who this Alexander should be, the Interpreters know not. Cruserius and Xylander think it should rather be Cleander, that fuffered himself to be corrupted by Pericles, and perswaded Plistonax to remove his Army out of Attica.

 $\mathcal{N}^{v\ MA}$, Cotemporary with $_{Hizekjab}$ King of Juda, and $_{Vabum}$ the Prophet.

The Senators one hundred and fifty. This is a mistake by all Stories, there being before the 25cession of the Sabines one hundred Senatours, and after one hundred more, never an hundred and fifty.

obsida 51. 42,

Interreign. The manner of this lowereign differs from the relation of it elfewere ; that the Interpreters think the words are depraved.

51. 62, Sha of Pomponius. He is eliewhere called fon of Pompilise Pomponius.

Made him to be bonourably buried. Panlanias and Pliny fay, that the god Bacchus caused the General of the Lacedomonians, when he belieged Athens, to make an honourable Funeral for the new Syren , that is Sophoeles.

cially, but necessarily, as doubting; for Livy confessed, that he doubts whether Tarquinius Superctally, but necessarily, as ununung; the feems to incline to the latter. Dienjam Halicarnaf-bin was the Coulen or Nephen of Prifem; he feems to incline to the latter. Dienjam Halicarnaffess shews by many reasons, that he was Nephew, lib. 4.

Called Postlike Marble. Paufanias lib. 1. Vales, there is a mountain by Abbens called Postliste. where are Marble quarries.

He began to build a City salled Sigliuria. Tis thought this is a miftake, and that it should be Signia, a Colony of Tarquinim.

Herminim and Lucretim. Livy and Halicaringem call him Lartim not Lucretim. 91. 27.

Pofihumine Balbus. Albus was the firname of the Pofihumians ; and therefore more likely the Greek, which hath Balbus, is wrong,

THE MISTOCLES, Cotemporary with Xerxes K. of Persia, Militades of Athins, and Afchilm the Tragadian.

Abretonon I am. Emilim Probm faies, Themiftocles father was a Gent, and his mother of Acarnania. The people use their Governours. The Original bath it Demagogues; that is, such popularmen, as can lead the people which way they lift, by their Orations.

Stefilaus that was born in the City of Teos. It should be in the Island Cos.

A place of Attica called Laurion. It is a place near Athens by the Sea, where they have Silver Mines.

All along the Isle of Aphetes. That is in Magnesia, as Diodorms expresly fairs, in the Bay of Pelafgos.

As Herodotus writesh. In the beginning of Urania.

With Oracles and answers from the gods. Herodosus in Politymnia hath the whole ftory of the Wooden wall; and the Oracle of the Divine Salamina.

A place called Melita. A place in Athens inhabited by the Tribe of Geerops.

Before the Altar in his Chappell. In the Greek is is onely, he went to the harth of the fire, no mention of Chappell or Altar: and that is most likely; the Religion given to harths being very notorious, and equivalent to Altars , pro Aris & Focis, For Altars and harths , is trite. 110. 40.

And foake with his fon there. That is Artaxerxes Longimanus.

AMILLUS, Cotemporary with Eldran, Artanernes K. of Perfin, Amyntan K. of Ma-C cedon , Ifecrates the Orator , Conon D. of Athens, Lyfander D. of Sparta.

Which some call Venetians. In the Greek it is Venetans, of the City Veii, Veientes more properly.

115. 60. Poets tales and fables. Livy accounted this also a fable.

Have made certain figne with their eyes. That is, have looke down to the ground as the Greek 116. 20. fignifies.

After he had made these prayers against the Citizens, as Achilles did against the Grecians. Achilles prayers went into a Proverb, as in the first Book of Homers Iliads.

Twenty years before. The Original hath it more then two hundred years before, and that is thought 120. 58. to be a miftake for one hundred.

The boly profession of the miftery of Jacobses. See in the Life of Phoesien the manner thereof.

PLUTARCH'S Lives.

The sirname at this day of Pipes. The Greek word rather fignifieth Barrels, or little Barrels.

About fixty furlangs. About eight furlangs made one mile.

Unto the City of Sutrium. Livy constantly calls it Satricum.

130. 63. Thirteen years after their taking of Rome. It appears out of Livy, and by the account of the Magiftrates, that it should be three and twenty.

Marcus Æmilius. Livy calleth him Æmilius Mamertinus.

PERICLES, Cotemporary with Zorobabel, who brought the Captive Jews from Babylon, Daring Histarpes King of Persia, Milisades of Athens.

133. 15.
The Tenth book, This place sheweth, that Plutarch used to call every Greek, and Roman compared, a book: fo by that reason this is not the tenth but the fifth book: by which it appears that we loft much of Plutarch.

Zeno who was born in the City of Elea. Elea is in Lucunia a City in great Greece.

As Plato faid. In his book of the Commonwealth.

By Demonides Counsel or procurement. In the Greek it is Demonides of fa, some Tribe or Village about Athens.

Thucidides of the Town of Alopecia. This Alopecia is of the Tribe of Antioch, and this Thucidides is not the Historian, but another, as by comparing of times appear.

As Plato faith. In Phedro and Gorgias.

That he did not believe in the gods. The Greek hath it not fo, but onely thus, He was accused of irreligioulnels.

Cylons Rebellion. This you may read of in the Life of Solon.

148. 50.

Were fold for flaves. It feemeth rather that they were onely disfranchifed, not fold. 140. 22.

They call heaven. The place is in the fixth of Homers Odysses.

148. 8. Being a man of very ill disposition in nature. The Greek hath it, being of a prodigal nature, and this is more congruous, for that it follows he grudged at his fathers hardiness. 148. 18.

Did unfortunately kill one Epitimius. In the Greek it is, that he killed his horse, that is Evisimius his horse.

FABIUS MAXIMUS, Cotemporary with Alexander the Great. Fergus first King of Scot-

Were called at the beginning Iodians. Sextus Pompeius says they were anciently called Jovians, because the first of that family was begot by Hercules, of a woman in a pit in Jovea.

That which they took for dulness in him. The Greek seems to be mistaken, the word there which fignifies good activeness, should rather be (and so some have corrected it) unactiveness.

So foon as the Prator Pomponius had received the news, he called the people to Council. Both the Confuls being absent, the Prætors supplied the Consuls place, as anciently, so several Authors have it, and amongst the rest Cicero in his tenth Epistle to Plancus.

151. 62. Lucius Minutius General of the Horse. Livy constantly calls him Marcus Minutius.

152. 20. He vowed. That he would facrifice all the profits and fruits that should fall the next year, of sheep, &c. It is in the Original what the spring should bring forth; and this by Livy is called the holy fpring, lib, 22.c. 34, &c. and that was called the boly fpring, which was brought forth betwirt the Calends of March, and the day before the Calends of May.

By Metellus special procurement. In the Original it is Metilius.

155. 17. A wife man can no ways be injured nor dishonoured. So in Lucius, Mercury comforts Jupiter, with that faying, Thou haft suffered no harm if theu caust dissemble is.

155. 64. He clapped his hand on his thigh. A gesture of forrow and indignation. So in the life of Pompey, when he received the news of the passing of the Manilian Law, he clapped his hand on his thigh. Giero in his first book to Atticut, seems to bring in striking of the forchead in stead thereof, or rather both, in his Oration for Q. Gallius, where he reproves M. Calidius for reproaching him; there was fays he, no trouble of mind or body, no striking of the forehead or thigh, &c.

156. 60. They had condemned him a little before to pay a great fine to the Treasury. Frontinus in his fourth book lays, that condemnation was for not dividing the spoils equally amongst the souldiers. 148. 14.

Barca a Carthaginian. Livy calls him Maherbal.

Fabius bu great Grandfather. Fabius Rullus.

A listle Iron Spit. It is more likely to be a little piece of money of Iron, such as was then used, for the same word here, obitifus, in the life of Lyfander, taken for such a piece of iron money, that he had nothing in his house but an iron spit, is improbable. 164. 28.

And yet Fabius might diffend no great revenue, for his whole recents came onely to fix Talents. This is mistranslated, for in the Greek it tuns thus, Fabius redeemed prisoners with his own money, yet it was no great fum, it amounted onely to fix Talents. These Prisoners were in number (as Plutareb above fays) 240. Livy adds seven more. It was agreed they should pay 250 pence for each priloner, fo according to Plutarchs number, there were precisely ten Talents paid for them, not onely six which perhaps is a miftake; because fixty pound, that is fix thousand pence, make one Talent.

ALCIBIADES, was Cotemporary with Haggens, and Zacharias the Prophets, Davins Nother King of Perfia.

That Thucidides meant of him. It is in his fixth book, before that his Oration wherein he perfeades to the War against Sicily.

PLUTARCH'S Lines

186, 20,

Called eaters of Acorns. The Oracle is cited amongst many Authors, and Herodotus hath it in his first book. Dionysiss in his first book of Roman Antiquities, says, that the Aborigines or Natives. from whom the Romans descended, and were encreased, came out of Arcadia into Italy: so that the Romans feem to take that cuftom from the Arcadians.

Thinking all due to his mother. In the original the is called Volumnia, Livy calls her Veturia, and calls his wife Volumnia, and some call her Virgilia.

186. 64. Marcus Valerius chief of the Senate. Dionylius in his fixth book, calls him Manins, he is mention ed in the life of Pompey.

Titus Latius. It is Titus Lartius in the original,

Plato called Solitarines. In his Epiftle to Dion.

There were three voices odd that condemned him. In the original it is, three Tribes giving their votes. they were three that condemned him. At that time there were in Rome twenty one Tribes, as it appears out of Dionysiss and Livy, saving that in Livy, in the second book (a little before the History of Coriolanus) thirty is erroneoully fet down for twenty. Now if the greater part absolved him, which must be, if three Tribes onely condemned him: furely then he had not been condemned: Therefore 'tis to be understood, that Coriolanus was absolved onely by nine Tribes, and condemned by twelve, that is, by three more then those, by which he was absolved. So Dionysius hath it in his feventh book.

Homer faid of Ulyffes. Into Ilium, the place is in the fourth book of the Odyffes. 194. Laft Line, Titus Latinus, Livy calls him Latinius, Macrobius calls him, Annius.

As Thucidides reports. In his fifth book.

Ariftides had done inold time to Themistocles, Valerine Maximus hath it in his fixth book and fifth Chapter.

The City of Alpse. It should be Galepse, so Livy calls it, lib. 44. 215. 48.

Unto the River of Sagra. This River Sagra is in that part of Italy called great Greece; there was the battle fought twixt the Locrisms and the Crotoniats, the Crotoniats brought into the field 130000. the Lecrians but 10000, with which they got the victory. The news of this victory came the same day to Olympia, Sparsa, Corimband Alberts; and thence grew the Proverb, when they told a truth to incredulous persons, they affirmed it was more certain then the battle at Sagra. It was sought about the reign of Tarquinius Priscus, about the fifth Olympiad.

219, 18. Cups and Gobless fashioned like Pischers. Like horns of beafts, the original hath it.

As Homer fai.b. It is in the laft book of the Iliads, being the words of Achilles to Prianine, defcribing the changeable condition of mans life, from prosperity to adversity.

TIMOLEON, Cotemporary with Ochus King of Persia, Philip father of Alexander King of Macedon, Ariffotle, Firgus King of Scotland.

Timoleon, Timodemus hu fon. Diodorus Siculus, calls him the fon of Timanetus.

231. 55. A River of Crimelus. It is ordinarily called Crimifus and Crimifus.

I would have rejoyced too faid he, if I had done this, but yet would I not for any thing, but I had given the Counfell. This is not well rendred, the Greek hath it thus. I would have rejoyced too, if I had done this, but I repent not of the counfel Leave; and fo it must need be to teltifie his conflancy to his opinion, though Liefthenss acting otherwise prevailed, yet that, it feems, Photon attributed rather to chance then vertue, and good conduct. Inabelife of Photon its plain there, to that question his answer is, I would I had done this, but yet I would not have given the counsel to have done thus, for his counfel was good, as at length appeared, though in the beginning, for a while it feemed other-

As Athams writes. Diedorus Siculus calls him Athacres, fays he was an Historian of Syracufe lib 2.

Timoleon led bie Army before the City of Calauria. Whether it was a City or no, appears not, the Greek calls, H. nata City, but Calarria onely, which being not mentioned elfe where, make some think it to be an Island in Peloponnesus, and other dream of Calabria in Italy, but doubilels it was a - 12 July 100 - 1 by Salam Catalogues 1 miles 1871 place in Sicily.

PELOPIDAS, Cotemporary with the former in Timoleon, and with Nehemiah Jere, Camillus and Manline Romans.

240. In the beginning. King Antigonus gave pay to a fouldier, among other a that were very hardy and adventurous. The fame word that fignifieth hardy, is brought to be the fouldiers name Itamus.

The Lacedamonians both in words and deeds did courteoully intreat the Thebans as their friends and cossiderates). This differs much from the Original both in words and sense; there it means thus. Af-terwards when the Lacedemonians in shew or in words (not in words and deeds as here) treated the Thebans as friends; that it was but in fnew appears also by that which follows.

They should fend the valiantest and lusticst young men before. In the Original, a few of the young

Avail As 242. In the bottom Maria Archias is called Bishop of Athens. Tis not proper, the Greek word fignifies an explainer of the facred mysteries. H erophanty, it is not & pifeopus, whereupon the word Bilhop comes. Wherefore that occurs in any prophane flory, especially before our Saviours death, it fignifies a supervisor of provisions of Corn, &c. and so it is in the Civil Law.

249. Towards the end. Where Ptolomy at that time made War mith Alexander. This is Ptolomy Alorstes the Son of Amjutas, and brother to that Alexander and Philip, who having killed his brother, became King.

of Macedon. Drave the Spartans beyond the River of Eurotas, and from mount Taygetum. The Original hath it, he forced them to contain themselves between the River Eurotas and mount Taygetus. So he contracted their bounds, before much larger.

PLUTARCH'S Lives.

Instead of the nine Officers. You may read of these Officers in the life of Pericles, and in the begining of the life of Ariftides.

MARCELLUS, Cotemporary with Antiochus Magnus King of Affyria, Philip fon of Demetrins King of Macedon, Ptolomy Philopater King of Agypt : Renda King of Scotland 255. 12.

As Homer faith. In the fourth book of his Iliads; they are Olysses his words of himself, and the Greeks against Agamemnon who perswaded them to fly.

246. 11. A malice that could not be practifed. Something improper, the original hath it, with an earnest indignation or anger.

They canfed the Gessates, mercenary people, &c. Some think they are called thus in regard of the Arms they used. Gasa is a kind of ball (which Propertius and Virgis speak of) that the slingers used; but Servius fays, that the Galles, called valiant men, Gafi.

257. 16. Minutius being Dictator also. Valerius faysit was Fabius, and 'tis more likely he was twice Di-258. 36.

The God to whom this manner of spoils are consecrated thus, is called Jupiter Feretrius. In some copies'tis read Opimius and Fereirius; probably best, because the opima spolia, were onely to be offered

There were five thousand of the Carthaginians left dead. Livy says, onely there were more then one thousand flain, taken sixteen hundred.

260. Towards the end. Laid fiege to the City of the Leontines, Here are some lines wanting, as by the twenty fourth book of Livy, you may read.

263, 25.

So he took, not ontly the Tomer. Livy in his 25, book tells the contrary of this Tower.

Fearing besides least a third criumph, &c. He had triumphed but once, and that over the Gauls? therefore this should be second and not third

Having flain the Vice-Conful mith eleven Colonels. Livy in the beginning of his eleventh book fays they were twelve.

ARISTIDES, Cotemporary with Xerxes, in the Scripture called Abasuerus, liusband of Esther.

Callias the Torchbearer. This was a great honor belonging to the Priefts. Paufanias reckons it for a great happiness, that it had continued in the family of Leon to the fourth generation.

He made a prayer contrary to that of Achilles in Homer, Homer Iliad. 1. for Achilles having receiv? ed injuries from Agamemnon, he prayed that always when he was not in fight, the Gregians might milcarry, that so they might the more defire his company.

278. 10. Against the strangers. Enemies, as saith Tully and Herodotus, were onely called strangers.

MARCUS CATO, the Cenfor, Cotemporary with Antiochus King of Syria, Eumenes King of Pergamus, Ptolomy Philopater King of Agypt; Rentha King of Scotland. 289. 2.

Marius Curio, who had triumphed thrice. Sigonius makes it appear he had triumphed four times. 289. 55.

Cast a little coat on his shoulders. The Greek hath it, a Coat without sleeves.

But Cato remembring with himfelf. That is when Xerxes his Army circumvented Leonidas, who had got the streights of Thermopyle, by the help of Ephialtes, that shewed him the way. Herodotus hath the history at large. This good had Cato by reading histories, no small part certainly of a good Firmaniant. Firmians sometimes called a Colony brought in, in the beginning of the first Punick War, as Velleim hath it.

He was accused almost fifry times. Pliny in lib. 7.c. 27. and in his book of renowned persons, says orty sour times.

Tett 3 forty four times.

After these words, viz. in an Oration Cato made before the people of Rome, should follow these words at it is in Greek Original. Livy faith, he that was killed was a Gaul, that had run away, and that Lucin; did not cause the man to be killed by the Executioner, but he killed him with his own handnow Lucius being thus shamefully, &c. In the life of Flaminius this is more fully fet down. 302. 6.

This onely man, &c. It is in Homers Odyffes, tenth book, speaking of Tyrefias, the onely wile shoft amongst all the ghosts in hell.

Cato the Philosopher. That was Cato Uticenfis, or Cato Minor : whose life follows afterwards 303. 48.

Hefiod the Poet, that commendeth justice so much. This is in his work of husbandry. Homers Verfes in the fourth of his Odyffes.

PHILOPOEMEN, Cotemporary with Marcus Cato Cenfor, next prefident.

First Line,

Caffander. In many Authors Cleander.

Afterwards when King Antigonus was come. Polybius in the end of his fecond book, writeth this ftory at large.

Poss of gold and filver. The Greek hath it, rich pots and cups, of one Thericles his making, a cunning Artificer.

As Homer faith it did Achilles. In the beginning of the ninth of his Iliads.

Aristenetus. This is he whom Livy erroneously calls, Aristicanius and Aristbemus. Polybius in his feventh book, rightly calls him Ariftenetus.

Against whom he was made General immediately. This history is full in Livy, lib. 35. 331.50.

Plato faid. In his fourth book of Laws.

Barchyletis. Livy in his 33 book calls him Barcilla, Polybius calls him Brachulles, lib. 17.

Crons fall down. Diodorsu mentions the like at the promulgation of the Gabinian Law, lib. 36. and Valerius Maximus hath the like, lib. 4. and 8. and it hath been observed where they have kept Pigeons to carry letters out of befieged Towns into the Countrey, the fouldiers marking when the Pigeons flew over the Army, suddenly shouted loud, and so the Pigeons fell down, and they took their letters.

Itanus the Historiographer. Guarinus calls him Hyrranus, and more likely, the name of Itanus not Terentius Culeo. It is Lee in the Greek, but Culeo is more likely, fo Livy hath it, and one Culeo is mentioned in Pompey's life, that perswaded him to put away Julia.

When he was General he did drive Nabis. It is fo in the Greek, but questionless mistaken, for so should Plato directly contradict himself, in the life of Philopamen, where he says that Philopamen being then not in authority, drave out Mabis. So the Negative doubtless is left out in the Greek corrupted by fome transcribers, it should be, he not being General, drove out Nabu; and this agrees too with the purpole and nature of this discourse.

PTRRHUS, Cotemporary with Selencus King of Syria, Demetrius King of Afia, Prolomy Philadelph King of Agopt, Menander the Post. Marius ion of Fergulus King of Sectland. Pyrrhus descended from Pyrrhus the son of Achilles.

331. 37. He had no teeth in his upper jam. Pliny writes that Prusias King of Bythinia had the like. 336. 21.

Let them for me divide. It is in Euripides in the beginning of the Phanifle.

337. I. His Horse Nisea. It should be his Nisean horse, and not the name of his horse. Nisea is a Country of Paribines, near the Caspian mountains, which breeds most excellent horses, which the Kings themselves used. So says Strabolib. 11. and Plin. lib. 6, c. 25.

Defired the watchw rd of him. The Greek word fignifies rather a truce or league, then a watchword: and so it seems rather by the sense.

Wickedness of their Governors. Demagogus in the Greek. See above, the notes upon Themistocles. 343. 59.

Whem he met in a very straight valley. In the Greek it is, in the streights called Seneca.

Minerva Itonida. From Iternia a City in Theffaly, where she was worshipped.

The great danger that fell upon all Italy out of the West. Now the Cimbrians came out of the North. there indeed was their habitation ; but they having been overthrown in Gallia, by Mallim and Cepio went into Spain and returned into Gallia, and joyned with the Tentons or Germans, to they were truly faid to come from the west.

Ambrons, Ambrons. And a little after it follows, and the Lygurians answered them, with the like noise and cry, Ligurians, &c. The Greek hath it not so, but that the Lygurians answered them with the like noise and cry, and no more; and likely it is, they cryed also Ambrons, Ambrons, &c. for Sextus Pompeius Festus, says the Ambrons were a Gallick people; and Strabo in his fourth book, fpeaks of a victory, the Marsilians had of our Ambrons, and the Marsilians are next neighbors, and so the Ligurians. The Ligurians affirmed, the Ambrons was their ancient name.

364. 12. Durft not once fee your backs, nor you them in the faces. The Greek word fignifies the hinder part of the head; so that rather it is, they were both alike Cowards, and fled from one another, at one

Antipater of Tharfis. He was a Stoick Philosopher, whom Strabo speaks of, lib. 14.

In the treasury of the Aranthians. The Greek says, the treasure of the Aranthians, &c. not the place where it was kept.

Antochitas the father of Lylander. Paufanias every where calls him Ariftocratus.

Socrates, Plato and Hercules. 'Tis conceived this should not be Hercules, but Heraclisus.

172. 15. After the overthrow of the Army. That is the Army fent with Nicial, which was overthrown, and he taken prisoner. So in his life here by Platarch.

375. Towards the end. The holy Galley called Paratas. This was a Galley exceeding fwift, for publick uses onely, carrying of Ambassadors and the like. See more of it in the life of Alcibiades.

There fell out of the air, a marvellous great stone. Pliny lib. 2. c. 58. says that this stone so fell, fixty years before this Sea fight.

That Ulyffes was not fubril alone. Because Vlyffes ; who had the fame of so wise and subtil a man, yet was over-reached and discovered by Palamedes, when he (Ulyffes) feigned himself mad to avoid going to the Trojan War. So subtil Lysander was over-reacht by the more subtil Pharnabazus.

Slew him with his Southfayer. Some Interpreters think that Mante (though in the Greek it fignific a Prophet or Soothfayer) is the name of a man.

STILA, Cotemporary with Tigranes King of Syria, and Ptolomy Auletes King of Agypt.

About Lavena. It is at Laverna, and this Laverna is more likely to be the gate Laverna, which Varro speaks of lib. 4. Laverna was the goddess of Thirves.

The Armory which Philo in old time had caused to be built. It was a very famous one, being an harbor for a thousand ships, fo says Pliny lib.7.c.37. Valerius lib.3.c.13. 404. Near the bottom.

Metrobius a finging man. The Greek, is, a Stage-player, a man acting a womans part.

355. 21.
Inhabitants of Putcola. In the Greek it is, Dicearchani, who afterwards were called Putcolani.

From the great Glabrio. It is fo in the Greek, but generally conceived to be an error, Glabrio being never mentioned without Epithete, 'tis rather thought the word Magnus, should be Manius or Mariu.

CIMON, Cotemporary with Xerxes, in Scripture, Abasherse husband of Esther, Thrasibalise C King of Sicily.

Elpinice did not secrety company with her brother Cimon, but lived with him openly as his lanful married wife. The Author of the book of Illustrious persons, which some say, is, exemilian Probus, writes that it was lawfull for the Athenians to marry their fifters, begotten of the same father, but of another mother, and the fault in Cimon was, that he lay with her, not having married her. Plutarch in the lite of Themistocles fays, that his son Archeptelis married his fifter Muesiprolema, born to The mistocles by another mother.

Like Turny fift. Athenam lib. 7. fays that about the Dog-days, the Turny being as it were mad, rufhes violently into the deep, and troubles the waters, the Etymology of the name, is from rufhing and moving violently. So the Roman Orators with their speeches, used to fir up the people to make them move.

423. 24.
Imbrued his hands in the blood of his Captains. That is Lucius Valerius Flaccus the Conful.

Marius a Roman Captain. In the life of Sertorius, he calls him M. Marius; and fome think 'is 421. Towards the end. not the great Marins seven times Conful, but another of that name. Appear calls him M. Varius.

Lucius Quintus one of the Prators. He was not Prator, but one of the Tribuni Plebis.

443. Towards the end. Horace writing this flory, lib. 1. Epift. to Numicius. Cruferus notes there, that Horace speaks of five thousand.

550. 12."
Ephipolis. 'Tis a part of Syracufa, fome Greek copies have Epifola, for Epipola, which brought Guarinns into an error, talking of Epifels or letters about Nicias his coming. Thapfus is a little Peninfula near Syracufa reaching to the Sea.

MARCELLUS CRASSUS, Cotemporary with Hyrcanus King of the Jews, Pomper, Ptolomy Antites King of Agypt, Julius Cafar.

In the beginning 'es faid of Craffus, that one of his brethren being dead, he married his wife, by whom he had children. The Greek word fignifieth living together, nor marrying, neither did ever the Romans use to marry their brothers wives. He kept her and his children in his house in meer humanity, had it been otherwise, how could Plutarch, have so commended his temperance, continency and modelty,

One Alexander did read to him. This is supposed to be Alexander the Milesian, who is called Polyhistor and Cornelius, who, as Suidas fays, lived in Sylla's days.

Onatius Aurelius. It is Ornatius in the Greek, but in the life of Pompey, where the fame flory is told he is called Cains Aurelins.

To call him Imperator, that is, fourraign Captain. Appian fays it was unufual to be so called till they had killed ten thousand of the enemies, and never given but upon some great victory and therefore Crassis is justly taxed of pusillanimity and vain-glory.

So the goddes Hierapolis. The goddes of Hierapolis, that is Juno of the Affyrians,

475. 20. Upon the Bridge he had made over the River Euphrates. In the Greek it is only thus. As he paffed his Army over the Zengma, &c. this is a City standing upon Euphrates, much spoken of by Historians, for the bridge of chains made there over Euphrates, by Alexander the great.

JULIUS CASAR, Cotemporary with Herod Antipater King of the Jews, Virgil, Saluft,

At what time Sylla was made Lord of all. In the Greek, after that Sylla being Conqueror, could neither by hope nor fear force Cefar to put away Cornelia the daughter of Cinna, that plaid the Tyrant, or tyranniz'd alone (to the Greek) he took her jointure from her. So it was here, Cinna, not Silla, that was Lord of all, or rather, as before, the Tyrant. Neither was Cinna Dictator, nor is it fo in the Greek Scratch his head with one finger only. So Clodius mockt Pompey, as an effeminate person, for so scratching his head. Lucian makes it a note of a nice, tender, and effeminate person. 592. 63.

An ancient custom. To make Funeral Orations in praise of old Ladies. Livy in his fifth Book, fays, Thanks were given to the Matrons for the Gold they gave, for the delivering Rome from the Gauls. And this honour was added to them, that they as well as men, should have Funerall Orations after their death. A little after he speaks of Casars first wife and his third, not mentioning his second, which was Cossutia a Knights daughter.

COURTEOUS READER.

N, the year of our Lord 1657. being defired, and encouraged, by feveral Perfons of Honour, to venture upon a new and fifth Impression of Plutarch's Noble Grecians and Romans Lives, and then considering with my self which way I might render this Work more acceptable to the present Age, and famous to Posterity. I pitched upon an Additional Select Collection of some choice Portraitures and Lives, both of Grecian, Latine, and Pagan, Illustrious Personages; Memorable for their Actions, Sentences, and Writings, which I thereunto annexed. The work it self was Originally written in French by Andr. Thevet Cosmographer to Henry the third the French King, at his said Masters request. And being it was the very marrow of his observations during his twenty three years travails and Peregrinations, throughout the chiefest and remotest parts in the world, whereby he procured unto himself an Intrinsick experience, both of Men and Places. I deemed that that Additional extract (never till then extant nor seen in English) would not in the least detract from Plutarch's Famous Worthies, but to the contrary add more lustre to their Memories; by evidencing to the world, that after Ages were not barren in producing as rare and Heroick Spirits as the former, and as able Pen Men (in imitation of Plutarch) to remit unto Posterity their immortal renowns. I did also cause their Effigies, or Sculptures to be inserted, exquisitely cut in Copper Plates, conformable unto those which our French Author had prefixed to his (which by repute are at prefent esteemed by all the Artists of our Nation to equal all others of that kind) and they

Work and satisfaction of the Readers curiosity.

My onely drift by that my Additional Collection, was, thereby to stir up our English Worthies to follow the footsteps of several of their Country-men (whose Lives were thereunto annexed, aswell as divers others who have excelled amidst other Nations, in their several professions and eminent conditions) that so they might acquire unto themselves an equal glory to theirs. And finding it fully answered my expectations, & gratefully excepted by thee, I have not onely in this Sixth Edition presented the same once more to thy view: but also (by the assistance of a Learned and Eminent Person) given you an additional Collection (out of the same Authour) of five other most choise Portraitures and Lives of most eminent & illustrious Personages, with their Essigies or Sculptures, in all things agreeable with our French Authour as the former were. Since the kind acceptance which the others received, declare the benefit and advantage which they brought to the Publick, I will not doubt the welcomness of these, being the best part of so precious a Record, for so it is accounted of by all or the best Wits and Learned Men in France, both by Reason of its impartial relations, ample and copious deductions, spaciousness antiquity and scarcity; as also in regard of its excellent Plates (as aforesaid) all which hath rendred it so considerable in France it self, that it is hardly to be compassed there under the sum of five or six pounds. In regard whereof, I conceived it could not chuse, but be a Work very acceptable to present you with the better part of it; (which you now have) the whole being of too great a bulk to be here inserted, and these choice Lives and Pourtraitures which you will hereunto find annexed, having been adjudged to be the very quintessence of Andrew Thever's labours: in confidence they will please, I shall commit you to the Almighties Protection, &c.

After which time being fervent and zealous in the Love of God and his Caufe, he inftituted and ordained feverall good Laws to the advantage and repose of the Civificans: he caused the Idols to be demolished and cast down, and rooted out their Temples and Groves, forbad them to be any longer worthipped or called Gods: caufed a Church to be boilt in his Palace, invited all men to receive Baptifm, and conferred on godly and falutary Ordiacount in the scale, months an inerto receive sapisson, and contested on goary and faturary Officers of the other Bishops, which being understood by Maximinist, on his Co-partner in the Empire, he was fore displeased, and raised an Army to expell him, but Constant the Constant of the the having gotten the flart of him, bearing the fign of the Cross in his Enligns, encountred him, and overcame him in two Battels. By this means the Christians being settled in Peace again, the Church began to fprout out and flourith anew, Constanting endowing it with several Immunities, Priviledges, Rents, Donations, Magnificences, Liberalities and Possessions. And whereas there beralities and produced to the Chiffier and happened forme difcords and divifions betwitt the churches concerning the Ceremonies, he ordains the Chiffier and proclaimed two Synods or Affemblies of Bifhops and Priefts, in which the controverfies and churches concerning the Ceremonies, he ordains and priefts and controverfies and contro points of Religion should be determined. Much about this time Licinius, unto whom Constanting had given his Silter in Marriage, and had made him his Confort or Companies in the Empire, rebelled against him, and endeauvored to thrust him out; but Constantine being advertised of his enterprise, drew forth his Army, defeated him in Hungary, purfued him into Macedonia, where he was a recruiting his Forces, drave him out of Asia, and purfued him to close at the heels, that at length he was forced to furrender himfelf, finding that he was overcome both by Sea and Land : he was fent into The flateny, in a kind of exile, there to lead a private life, however at length he could not avoid the due vengeange of his audacious attempt, cruelty, and difloyalty, for he was flain by Configurines Guards about the three hundred and four and twentieth year of our Lord. Moreover Confiaming Byzantium ta- took Bizantium a City in Greece, which had been formerly deftroyed by Galienus and Pertinax, and cauling it to be built up a new, he called it by his own name Conference recking many Trophics of the Cross in it, and confecrating severall Churches in it, to the honour of God, of the Apostles, and of the glorious Martyrs. And it is a wonderful and most observable thing, that this most flour-Two Emperors ishing City, thus enriched, re-edified, and imbellished, even from the very foundation by the aforclaid Confiantine, Son of that Saint-like Hellen, was (by a fatal deftiny, during the Reign of another Coeffiantine, whose Mothers name was also Hillen) taken and conquered by Mahimet (the first of that Name) Emperour of the Turk, in the year one thousand four hundred fifty and two under whole power and subjection (as also of his successours) it hath remained ever fince that time to this very day. So the enemy of mankind not being able to brook fuch a tranquillity, did fuscitate and stir up the Heretick Arius, who for fo many Ages together hath poyloned all the parts of the earth with his blafphemies and falle erroneous opinions, fowing a division betwirt the Bishops and the Churches; some adhering unto resie begun, his doctrine, others detefting the fame, whereby there grew a great combustion and confusion in the Church, which coming to Constantines ears, he was much grieved thereat; and thought it was his duty to rectifie the fame; and therefore caused some Synods and Assemblies to meet, for to dive into the questions and diffentions of Arisa; the Emperor himself writing to the Prelates, befeeching and admonifhing them to maintain the truth, however the gap grew wider and wider, parties becoming daily more bitter and envenomed against each other, which to prevent in a more ample manner. the Emperor fent his Letters Pattents throughout the whole Empire, and commanded all the Bithops and Learned Persons to Assemble at Quea, a City in Bithinia in Asia; at which Synod there The first Niappeared three hundred and eighteen Bilhops, with as many, if not more, Deacons and Doctors, concan Countwhich was the first Council held in the Greek and Latine Church. It would be a matter of too cil. much prolixity, to run over all the memorable fayings and speeches uttered by Constantine hunself in this univerfall Councill touching Peace, Concord, Amity, the comportments of Christians, and the duties to be performed by them. I will onely mention that worthy fentence which he preferred when fome Bishops did present unto him certain injurious, slanderous, and libellous writings, concerning the vices and dealings of others their fellow Bishops, when as taking the Papers, and slinging them Constanting into the fire (being unwilling to read them) he made answer, That God alone being the fale fudge, resolution as feer and learther of all mens thoughts, and thirfly of the Priefts, he would not in any wife undertake to to Ecclefialliintermeddle in their affairs or questions, nor prie into their manner of Lives. The Heretick Arius cal differences, and his complices were condemned in this Council of Nicea (and not in the Council of Nice, a City in Europe, as some Authors have very impertinently written) But afterwards the Empirour being The condemfeduced and abused by the subtilities of a Priest, and by the falls and seigned consession or Arius, re-ration, restauceived him into favour again, whence some did take an occasion to say, that Constantine had suffered death of Ariss. himself to be tainted and misled with Arianism: but at length this Monster Arins, condemned by the just judgement both of God and Men, ended his dayes most miserably, his guts bursting forth. and his bowels iffuing out at his fundament. And returning to our Constantine, we shall let you see how great a lover of Justice, and punisher Constantine of crimes he was; for at the infligation and acculation of Fansta his wife, it is believed he caused his fauseth both his Son Crifput Son Criffus to be put to death, accused by her that he would have ravished her; but afterwards, be- and his wife ing affured of the falfenels of his faid wives acculation, he caused her also to be flain, a severity Fausta to be which by some was imputed to a cruelty in him, though not degenerating from Piety, wherewithall he put to death; was endowed, for at that time he was not regenerated by Baptism. To recount and set down the other Graces and Vertues which this Emperour did possess, would be superfluous: As touching his Piety, Humanity, Liberality, Learning, and rare Perfections: nor was he to feek, or ignorant in the leaft in any Arts or Sciences, for himself did compound several Books both in Greek and Latin, as shall be hereaster mentioned. He so highly esteemed Learned men, as that his Court abounded with them, noured learned with whom he gladly and affiduously conferred, especially about the understanding of the Scriptures, men. with Enseiss and Lastantius who were two of those with whom he was most familiar. The Books which as aforefaid he compoted, both in Latin and in Greek, were concerning the Nicenean Synod, touching the Divine Providence to the Senate of Rome, to the Judges of the Eaftern Pro- Books written vinces, of Christian Laws, against the superstitions of the Gentiles, to Eufebium Bishop of Cafarea, by Constantine. to the Provinces of Palestine, against Alexander and Arise; and such others as were plunged in his Heresie: unto the inhabitants of Nicomedia a City in Asia, unto Sapor King of Persia, to all the Enstern Chairenes, to the Bishops and Doctors who affished at the Countil, to the Judges and Citizens of Athens and Antioch, to the Bishop Macharine, to the Bishops of Palestine, to the good Fathers who affifted at the Synod of Tyrus, to Athanasim the Patriarch of Alexandria; besides divers others, which I shall omit, to avoid prolixity. He bore such an ardent affection to his new Rome. that the better to beautifie and adorn her with precious rarities and Antiquities; he scrupled not to bereave (according unto Saint Jeroms report) all his Cities and leave them naked, for to imbellish and compleat his City of Constantinople. To which purpose he carried out of the Cattle that was at transports fe-Ilion, the chief City of Troy, the Palladium of Troas, and the Statue of Apollo which was made of veral rarities Brass of an almost incredible bigness. From Rome he carried away a Column of Porphyre called Co- to Constanticlie, which he caused to be environed with several Meddals, and placed in the Market-place which is nople. Paved with Frise-stone, upon the top of which he caused his own Statue of Brass to be placed, holding in his right hand a golden Globe, upon which the fign of the Crofs was fixed; which is yet standing upon the top of the fecond Mountain, or Eminence in the City, but the faid Statue is somewhat impaired, not so much by length of time (although 'tis avery Antick one) as by reason of the great Constantine Fires and Earthquakes wherewithall the City hath been overwhelmed; before which time (accor-warred against the Inhabiding to what some Historians have written) he maintained harsh Wars against the inhabitants of Bi-tents of Birth. zanting, because they would not be obliged to pay him any Tribute, or be subjected to obey him; and tium and concoming to fight them in a pitcht Field, at first they killed him abundance of his men, but at length quered them. not without a great deal of difficulty he conquered them, and did there build the City which is ho-

tants had shewn themselves to the ancient seat of his Dominions. And finally he became so enamoured with this new City, as that he conceived it was impossible for him to be glutted in the adorning oured with this new City, as that he conceived it was important for man to be function the admining of it. Afterwards he peopled it with fuch Christians as he could affemble out of Armenia, Georgia,

Palestine, and Egypt, and who were fled into those parts, to avoid the sad perfecutions by Diselesan, and the which were renewed by Lieinius, Constantines brother in Law. Moreover, as he had an, and the Empire divided; fo did he again divideit, as a Paternal inheritance, and bestowed it upon his three Sons, whom he created all three of them Cafars, during his life time, the one after the othe first cons, whom he reaches an interest the constant of his Reign, Constanting his fecond Son ther, viz. Constanting his eldest Son in the tenth year of his Reign, Constanting his fecond Son ther, vie. Confrantine in character on in the count year of this Sons in the thirtieth year. The Reigns of in the twentieth year, and Confrant the youngest of his Sons in the thirtieth year. Constantes three-Sons crethele his faid Sons proved very turbulent and troublesome, and lasted not above four and twenty years five moneths and twelve days. As for this our Confrantine, he dyed at Nicomedia on the one and twentieth day of the moneth of May, during the Confulfing of Felicians, and Tatianss, which was confirming the in the fecond year of the two hundred fourfcore and feventh Olympiad; and in the year of the Salvation of all mankind, three hundred thirty and nine, after he had lived threefcore and fix years, and had reigned thirty and one. Some will needs have us believe, that he was poiloned in his Countrey or Garden-house hard by Nicomedia; however it was, his death was foretold two years before by the appearance of a Comet of an unufual bigness. Lying on his death bed, he ordained and com-Athansfus remanded that Athanasius should be recalled from his banishment, whom himself (being deceived and induced that Attornay in mound of recentled from the boanding and grudge) had banifhed; fo that he returned induced thereunto by the Arians who bore Athanafiss a grudge) had banifhed; fo that he returned again to his Bishoprick of Alexandria; Eusebiss and all his other advertaries being present. He again to the composition of Zervanders, and the hands of that fame Prieff, who had so much stickled for unpoieu of this tast, we in and a citation, more than by his Sifter Conftance (who had been Licinius Arius, and who was so much recommended unto him by his Sifter Conftance (who had been Licinius his Wife) as file lay a dying affuring that he was a very honest man, whom Constantine caused to swear, the the would not deliver the faid Will to any other, fave unto Conffanting when he should be returned from the East, for none of his children were prefent at his death. After his decease, his body was laid on Will and Ica Golden Bier, or Bed of Honour, and was conducted by his Captains, Lieutenants, and by the Officers of his houshold, into the City of Constantinople; and was there placed in an eminent and high place to be viewed of all Men. And those of his Court did continue to perform unto his dead body the fame fervices and honours, as they had done whilft he was alive, untill fuch time as his children, or at leaft one of them was returned for to cause him to be interred. The whole City lamenturen, or at reast one of them was returned to the constraint to be anterior. The whole cary faileding and bewailing in a high degree, the loss of their Great Emperor, and mourning and weeping bitconjuntines ing and newaning in a niguregree, the tops of their dear and tender Father, all of them had by the labels ving often tafted and had the experience of his Graces and Benignity. And as I have afore mentioned he left the Empire unto three of his Sons, who in flead of maintaining themselves therein by Union, Peace, Concord, and Amity, fell foul together, and tore each other afunder. By the division which Constantine the Great did make of the Empire, Constantine who was the elder brother enjoyed Ganl, or France, Spain, and England. Confians the younger brother, had all Italy, Slavenis and Greece. And Confiantiss the fecond brother possessed Constantinople, and all the East. But this repartition not pleafing Confantine, he commenced a quarrel with his brother Confant, waging a cruel and deadly war with the Gault or French, with whom fighting furiously, but more greedly

ARCHIMEDES, a Philosopher of Greece.

Ann. Mund.

Ant . Christ.

His great Geometrician, and most admirable Contriver Archimedes, whose Picture I prefent you here with, to the Life, which I brought from Sicile made in Brafs, like unto a rare Medal which is usually found in the Foundations of such Cities as are built by the Roman Emperours, he was fo incomparable in his time, that all the Greek and Latine Hiftorians thought it no incumbrance to manifest his fubrill Inventions, Sciences, and those admirable Parts wherewith he was endowed : so that of old when a man would expression exquisitely a thing was done, he needed but to fay, that Archimedes could not have better deferibed or fet it forth. Cicero also recites this Proverb or Problem of Archimedes, to fignifie a question unknown, abstrufe, and difficult to be resolved, and which ought to be examined with exquisite industry. The Inhabitants of Sicile did formerly so highly reverence him, as that they caused a costly Statue of Marble to be erected in honour of him; which was of that immensity, as being beheld afar off, it feemed to be a fecond Coloff of Rhodes. True it is, that this personage born at Spracusa, a City in the life of Cyprus, living in the time of a mighty and rich King Hiero, effected such things as were never heard of before, and almost incredible; which he hammered out by his own invention. Now if any one defireth to be fatisfied as concerning those marvellous things, which he by his rare Genius brought to perfection, let him read Plutareb on the Life of Marem Marcellm, and Tiem Living in the fourth and fifth of his third Decade; where he shall find, that the onely Engines The Engines and Instruments which Archimedes did make, were sufficient to defend the place for a long time a- and Instrugainst all the affaults of the Romens. For he caused a slinging Engine to be made of a wonderful ments made by height and greatness, the which from the top of the Tower of the said City did cast out a hundred great Stones, Bullets, or Darts, upon the Enemies Camp. For which reason Eustarhius calls him a Giant with an hundred arms, cafting forth a hundred heavy maffy frones at one shock; which though doubtlefs were admirable works in themfelves, yet he made no account nor effects of them; reckoning them not as his Mafter-piece, but onely as Geometricall toys and paftimes, made at the request of Hiero King of Sicile. Amongst other things it is related, that when all humane force was not able to draw a great Ship out of the water, with an infinite fort of Cables and other Engines. Archimedes alone drew it on Land, as if it had failed on the Sea. During the Siege of Syracufa by the Roman Army, he made fuch Instruments, as that casting over the Walls great Iron Grapples fastned to it on Chains, giving their their Counterpoize within the City, he lifted up a Galley into the air, and drowned all the men that were in her in the Sea, for he caused the faid Galley to fall perpendicularly or down right, so that it brake in pieces. And with other Instruments and Grapples, he did so wonderfully shackle the Galleys and Ships, as that he forcibly drave them against a Rock, and bruised them to shivers. Also he built fuch like Engines on Land, with which he usually destroyed many of the Enemies. By which refiftance which Archimedes made in Spracufa, the General, Conful, Marcu Marcellu, that excellent Captain, was forced to alter the dipolition of his Camp, and to feek out another way and manner to befirge and affault the City; in which Siege he found himfelf in a great deal of peril and confusion. For Arch weder had put the Roman Souldiers into fo great an amatement, that when they faw the leaft Chain, or but a bare Pole let down from the Walls of the City, they retired and fled away, beingerrified at the Inventions and Engines of this great Artift, The Mathematicians and Aftrologers attribute the Invention of the Materiall Sphere to this fubtill Philosopher, by which the Motions of all the Planets, with their Conjunctions, Passions, and Aspects, may be plainly perceived; although Diogenes Lacrius feens on the contrary to believe, that Anaximander the Philosopher, who was a Milefian, was Author and first Inventor of so rare and excellent a piece. Which we were willing to note by the way, to leave every man to his own liberty to judge thereof. For my part, I have Citero that great Orators Warrant for what I fay , who in the first Book of his Tusculan Questions, is pleased to give Archimedes onely the commendations to have been the first Inventor of the Sphere. With whom Clandian the Poet agrees; who faith that he made one of Christall. And Ovid also confirmeth it, alledging that it could not be very difficult for him to frame one of (hriftall, fince he had fufficient means to perform it, and industry enough to invent one; yet I would have you to know, that I relie not so much upon these Poets verbal expressions; fince I must acknowledge, that by the Chrystaline Sphere which they attribute to Archimedes, their meaning was onely to afcribe unto him the invention of the Sphere, because that by the Circles and other properties of it, he did represent unto us, as in a fair Christall Glass, the severall Motions, Aspects, and Conjunctions of the Orbs: And certainly be must needs have been as studious as contemplative, and as wife as judicious. Now when as Syracufa was taken by affault, after it had been folely by his industry for a long time defended: the Confull Mircellin gave ftrict charge that no man on pain of death should dare to kill Archimedes, although he had destroyed so many Roman. Yet a Souldier meeting him by chance (happily not knowing him) as he was buffed in drawing a Scheme in the fand, and asking him who he was; or (as others fay) commanding him to go and speak with Marcellan, Archimedes gave him no answer, or was so attentive and set upon the placing of this Figure, as that he minded him not. Whereupon the Souldier being angry, killed him, which highly displeased Marcellus, who caused him to be honourably interred. Others fay , that he made no other reply unto the Souldier , fave that he was fo deeply engaged in the description of his Figure, as that he could not well tell how to difintangle himself. And it is very remarkable on the death of Archimedes, that the apprehension of death which was fet before Archimetes to him, could not divert him from his Mathematicall ploddings. Hereon I fay, that the diligence which buffe in deferibuffe in deferit man a commended, because he was so much bent upon this worthy Imployment; bing a Figure, he used is very much to be commended, because he was so much bent upon this worthy Imployment; as that he was whereby he ought to be admired above all other Philosophers, forasmuch as all of them did reject and not fentille of despife the Goods of Fortune (as men call them) but at the time of the Souls separation from the student when a men many larger than the student when a men many larger this World history and the student when a men many larger this World history and the student when a men many larger this work is the student when a men many larger this work is the student when a men many larger than the student when a men call them) and the student when a men call them is the student when a men call the stu Body (when as we must leave this World) there were very few of them that did not retrounce the bargain. We read that Carneade, an ingenious and laborious Philosopher was fo addicted to his Studies, that he would not admit of the leifure to eat : yet however he had one Melifia his Concubine, whom he accounted of as his Wife, and who to hinder him from ftarving when he fafted too long, would bring him such things as were fit to nourish him. Anaxagor as also, and Democrism, did so much defpife Wealth, as that the one gave the greatest part of his Estate to his Countrey; the other was not displeased in the least, when he saw all his Goods and Possessions lost and ruined; because they accounted it but a tye, whereby being as it where chained, they could not freely refign themselves to confer with the Mules. To speak the truth, all these Philosophers did things worthy of great commendation; but there is not one of them like unto our Archimedes. For they could not choose but apprehend the enfuing dangers and incumbrances. But had they been like unto Archimede, in the facking of a City, having the Sword fet upon their throats, we should have found very few Archimedes's, who would have continued their Descriptions and Demonstrations. Some write of him, that oft times he was taken from his Study, and conducted to the Baths, and was there washed and anointed, without any outward fensibility delineating always his Figures upon his body with his singers; so attentive was he on his Speculations. I had forgotten to mention the ingenious Discovery which he made, to know how much Gold might have been taken away from a Crown, and Silver mingled inflead of it. But because the History hath been largely handled by some Modern Writers, I remit the curious Reader to a Discourse made thereon by Peter Meffes in his Forest of divers instructions. Cierre gloried that he first found his Sepulchre, which by age and neglect was unknown; and he made great account of it. So likewife the Spirit and Industry of a learned man can effect more than the force of thoulands of ignorant men. He lived in the time of Sulpirim Gallon, of great Onion the High Prieft of the Jews, of Ariftobulus the few, and of Peslom Epiphases the first King of Egypt, in the year 5000, and he was slain at the facking and taking of Spracufa, as aforefaid, the year after Rome was built, 543. He compoled an excellent Book of the Cylinders, which Book hath fince been recovered, and translated into Latin by the command of Pope Nicolas the fifth.

Moreover it is reported of this admirable Philotopher Archimedes, that his fublime knowledge in the Mathematicks was arrived to fo high a pitch, as that he should fay, that could be have found any point out of the Terrestrial Globe to have fixed his foot upon, he would have removed the Fabrick of the whole World, &c.

THE LIFE OF

DIOGENES the Grecian Philosopher.

Ann. Mund. 3598.

Ant. Christ. 350.

Hough doubtless many have heard some Coridons, or Mechanick fellows, either in jeft or earnest vending their judgements on him whose Effigies or Protraiture is here represented, in the same manner as it was given unto me at the City of Andremopolis in Greece (being as I was affertained) found in Calcedonia, in the times of the Emperors Bafilius and Constantius, who were brothers, in the year of our Lord nine hundred feventy and eight: yet however he ought not therefore to be accounted of, as an abject or contemptible person. And if we rather chuse to reflect upon his internal then external parts, we shall find that The diversities he is worthy of a great deal of Honour. For as we read of two Ancient Philo- of Philolo-fophers Democrism and Heraclitus, who inceffantly (the one by his Laughter, and the other by his ons have one Tears) did tax the Follies of the vulgar; both of their expressions tending to one and the self same and the self purpose. So likewise, amongst the Philosophers, the Stoick was severe; the Academick dubious, same end. the Peripaterick Politick, the Cynick free and willfull; yet however all these had but one and the

felf fame fcope, viz. To Philofophize. Now amongst all those who have followed this Cynicall manner of living, Diogenes may be placed in the first rank, as being the sole Philosopher, who did lead a free and careless life, without Diogenes birth any goods, or estate; he was born at Synope, a Maritime Town situated upon the Borders of the and Parentage. Ensiman Sea, his Father was named Icesius an Usurer, who put him for a while to School, bur at length Diogenes being driven our of his Countrey, retired himself unto Athens, where he learnt Philosophy of Antifibenes: wherein he made so good a progress, as that he became one of the most excellentest Philosophers of all Greece. His Life was most strange, which he lead in the greatest Powerty that possibly could be; for despiting the pleasures of the world, he contented himself a great thrange manwhile with a Tub for his habitation, the entrance of which in the Winter he did turn towards the ner of life. South, and in the Summer towards the North. He did ask Alms, carrying a flick in his hand, and a waster on his shoulders in the same manner as you see him described. He was so great a lover of the Diogones a Philosophical fasulty, that his Master threatning to beat him out of doors with a stick, because that great lover of bedid not take any Scholars to teach; Diogenes profering his head unto him, faid, Srike on I Philosophy, pray, for you hall not find any flick hard enough to drive me out of your School. Many memorable gent his fayings and speeches are recorded concerning this most excellent Philosopher; some of which (all-speeches and the school of the though facetious, yet full of Learning) I have thought fit to infert in this prefent discourse. When actions. he faw Phylicians and Philosophers in company together with other men , he would usually fay , That

Hearing a proper handsome young man utter unfeeming and distincts language, he asked him, Whether be was not assamed to unstrate a Leaden sword, out of an Ivory scabbard? To a Logician, who by his Arguments went about to prove there was no motion at all, He onely walked along, and asked him what he thought of that? Alexander the Great having conquered Greece, and being at Alberts, he was desirous to see Diogenes, by reason of his great Fame, and he great panels was sitting in the Sun, he asked him whether he needed any thing and thought the model and the great panels was sitting in the Sun, he asked him whether he needed any thing, and though it were never to much he would give it him. At which answer, Alexander was so aftonished and rejoyced, that turning back to some who floured thereat, be faid, I would affaredly chuse to be Diogenes, were I nor Alexander. Moreover the fentences and rare answers pronounced by this Philosopher were numberlefs, so that we shall pass by divers of them to avoid prolixity. He was very well verfed in all Arts and Sciences. He faid, That knowledge is correllion to the young, comfort to the old, viches to the poor, and ornament to the rich. He delpifed those Arts which were unprofitable, and such persons as study, rather to acquire knowledge, then to practife Vertue. He compared a rich ignorant man, unto a Golden sheep. In Summer he laid on the fand in the Sun. And in the Winter he would grafp the Statues and Trees which were covered with Snow, the better to accustom himself to support both the heat and the

And as aforetaid he carried a Wallet, in which he put his Victuals ; and he had a wooden difli, out of which he drank, but he brake his diff, feeing a child drinking out of its hand; and admiring the childs with faid, it was not requifite for a man to trouble himself with a vessel to drink out of, fince Naure

furnished him with one. He also flang away his wooden Trencher, seeing another cut his meat upon his bread. Being demanded way fome did out him a Dog ? He answered, Because I make much Diogenes his of those who give unto me; I bark as those who deny me, and I bise the harsh and fromard. He would reason why he not be buried after his dearly, whereas his friends wondring, represented unto him, that being left upon was called a the ground, without Sepulchre or Grave, the Beafts would devour him. To which he affivered, Dog That they may not do so, pray lay my stick by my side: At which they laughed, telling him, That the His reason dead did neither see non feel; whereure he sephyed, If therefore the dead do neither see nor feel; what why he would us it to me, whether the Beast's do eat me, the Birds do pick me, or the Worms of the earth devourme? not be busied And as he was thus fantastick in his manner of living, in his speeches, and Actions ; yet far more singular was he in the rule and conduct of those whom he had under his charge. And namely in the bringing up of Xeniades and Corinthians children; unto whom he was fold at Crete or Candie by Scirpalus, Diogenes taken the great Pyrat, who took him at Sea as he was going to Aquinas. And these were the Rules which at Sea and sold he prescribed unto his Scholars. First, he would have them to addict themselves unto those good and found disciplines on which he did read most admirable Lectures unto them: afterwards he caused Diogenes methem to ride the great horse, to shoot with the Bow, and to be good slingers; chiefly forbidding thod towards them to strain themselves in wrastling; enjoyning them moreover, not onely to Learn and Con all his favings by heart; but also all the Poets rare Composures; would suffer them to eat but a very little meat and drink nought fave water. He caused them to be shaven to the very chin, and made them go abroad unready without shooes, willing them to dress themselves as they went through the streets. because they should lose no time. And for all this harsh demeanor and austerity of Life; his Scholars did love and cherish him extreamly, and mediate to have been treated and used more humanely and Diogenesischocourteously in the house of Xeniades then his quality of a fervant and a slave deserved, which is a lars affection most remarkable acknowledgement of Scholars towards their Masters, and whereunto common sence to him. and reason might easily induce them.

Which Alexander the Great testified, by bearing as great a reverence unto Aristotle his Master as unto Philip of Macedon the King his Father; because that by the one he had received his Life, and Alexanders reas the or map of seasons to live Well. But to return unto Diogenes, he was highly efteemed by Xe., verence to his the best of the press care and diligence. Maller, niades his Master, not onely for his rare Wit and knowledge, but for the great care and diligence wherewithall he employed himself in his Domestick affairs, who otherwise had not long harboured him in his house; and Xeniades at length being constrained to acknowledge, that Diogenes had brought good luck to his house, he took such an affection unto him, as it is believed he never parted with him till his dying day; and divers are of opinion that he dyed at his Mafter Xeniades house, at a place called the Crane at Corinth; grounding this their belief on Diogenes his answer to his Mafter, that he would be buried with his face downwards; and they do add that his Scholars Xeniades children did Diogenes his bury him. However some will not let them reap the honour thereof by reason of the contest which were amongst his friends concerning his burial; and therefore they are of opinion, that all his friends jointly did makehima Tomb, and placed a Column upon it, on the top whereof there was the figure of a Dog engraven, (Itmay be because Plato had called him so) As also that to outvie each other, they adorned his Grave with leveral brass Statues, placing this like inscription upon his Tomb, translated

out of Greek

My felf being in the 1fle of Crete, or Candie, about half a league from the place where the Labirinth or Maze was, which is fo much written of by the Ancient Authors; fome Grecians of the faid Island did shew unto me certain rulens and very great stories which savoured much of Antiquity, In Diogenes his which place they told me Diogenes had for feveral years read his publick Lectures according as it was reading place contained in the vulgar Greek Authors) and called that place Stabilities, by realon (as I do confection according to the most proper fignification of the word) of the many roots that are there. And as there were diverfiry of opinions concerning his Sepulchte; fo likewise were they worse divided concerning his death. Some say, that as he was very careless of his Diet, he did one Diversity of day eat an whole cold Ox foot, whereby he drew down so pernicious a Rheum into his mouth, as that opinions conbe dyed thereof: others have been pleafed to fay, that being overburdened with old Age, and regreting his long life, he did wrap limfelf up in his Cloak, and so smoothered himself. CONSTANTINE PALEOLOGUS.

THE LIFE OF CONSTANTINE PALEOLOGUS, the last Christian Emperor of Greece.

Ome men have very inconfiderately dived into this nice inquiry and ferutiny, why Empires, Kingdoms, Principalities and States, have fometimes been subverted, destroyed, and brought to nought; and at other times raised up, reftored and exalted: Finally, why Empires have so often changed their se-

I have met with some of these who would even winde & screw up their Speculations to the very Skies, and rashly do fancy to themselves, that they are much efficacy and felf-belief of the truth, as Trinmpho of Camarin did (a retainer unto the Lord Peter Ubaldim , a Knight and Nobleman of the City of Urbin) who most fantaftically did imagine and perfurade himfelf, that really and truly, at a certain hour in the day, he was affembled together in company with the Pope, the Emperor, and the feveral Kings and Princes of Christendows (although all that while he was alone in his own Chamber by himself) where he entred upon , debated , and refolved all the States Affairs of Christendam , and verily believed that he was the wifest man of them all; and so he well might be, of the company. Others again, relying upon the viciflitude of things, do forge a like necessity, That Empires and Kingdoms having once artained their appointed periods, are necessitated to cast up the Cards, to shur the Tables, and to refign the Game to the better management of those who successively are enthroned and invested therein. As for my part, I had rather refign my felf to the Almighties will, unto which the cause of the translation of Scepters ought to be folely attributed, fince he maketh them to fall into fuch hands as he pleafeth. For a most evident testimony hereof, we cannot make choice of a fitter Pourtraiture, than this of our first Confiantine, which I recovered at Confiantinople, ingraven in a Mo-Conflamine Pa- faick stone. This was he who bearing the same Name as he did who transported the Roman Empire lessegur an ex into Greece, did lose it, eleven hundred twenty and one years after Constantinople was built by Confinnine the Great, as I shall proceed to relate unto you. He was the Son of Emannel the Son of John Paleologius, who was most renowned for the several Heroical Actions which he did; as well by or Fortune. Confinning Pa- fortifying of Greece, walling about the Istmus or Hescaride of Corinth, and the maintaining of his teologus defent Empire in Tranquillity, Repole, and Peace, which he had made with Emanuel the first of that Name, but the third King of the Turks. I thought good also to note, that this Emanuel caused a Synod to fembled a Sy be affembled at Cnstantinoph, unto which the Patriarchs of Constantinophe, of Antioch the great, of nod. Perusalism, of Agypt, together with divers other Prelates, were called to refolve on the interpretation of this Passage in the holy Gospel , My Father is greater then I. Whence some malicious ill advised men did deduce a most pernicious and damnable consequence, by inferring some The pernicidegree and difference between them, or to their Natures. But to return to our purpose. Though ous effect of it. Emanuel did maintain his Empire in reft and quietness, yet his Children indeavoured what in them lay, to rend it afunder. For against John the fourth of that name, Dametrius his Brother role up Differences in competition; and for his better support, he entred into a League with the Turks, who attem-betwitt Emapted to rulh into Morea, but were forced to defer that defign till another time. And Constantine nutls Sons. himself brake down that Wall which Emanuel had caused to be built at the Streights of Corinth : evidencing that he aspired to the Empire, and to the Dominion of Morea. And so it was, that when John Paleologus, Confrancines Brother died, he was in Morea : where for those valiant Exploits he performed against the Turks, whom he sharply intested, he was surnamed Draco, or Dragon. And it was ten to one, but he had been frustrated in his succession of the Empire; for Dene- Confinnine firtrim his younger Brother being at Confiantinople when this Emperour died, would have usurped the or Dragon. Empire, although Constantine was his elder Brother. And it is very probable, that unless the Stampoldanians had withstood his endeavours and Forces, he had very easily instroned himself, taking the advantage of his Brother Constantine's being so deeply ingaged at that time against the Turks; and that no confideration whatfoever was able to reclaim him from purfuing of them. However, as I was a telling of you, the Inhabitants of Constantinople would not permit him to assume the Imperial Dignity, fearing that their City might come to be ruined, in case they had admitted and savoured the vounger Brother against him , unto whom of right the Empire did belong. Wherefore it was agreed Confiantine wounder brouter against thin, and the Emperour, and that Demetring and Thomas should equally inherit Greece. the Dominions of Morea betwirt them. But it had been far better, that either the one of them had possessed it alone, or that both of them had gone without it, by reason that their differences and Dimetrius and ars gave an admittance and footing, into so gallant and strong a Countrey, unto the common Ene- Thomas's Sons my of Christendom, the Turks, who became at length absolute Masters thereof. And as for our make entrance Conffantine, he enjoyed no long repose nor tranquility in his Dominions; for after the death of old for the Turks Amurath (who died in the year of the World,4511, and in the year of our Lord and Saviour, 1450.) Mahomet, the second of that Name, succeeded him (and not Mahomet the first , though the first Emperour, as by a mistake it was set down in the Life of Constantine the Great) who puzled the Emperour extreamly, and all those who were Subjects unto his Dominions. And that I may not too Mahomet the much inlarge, Mhall content my felf to recount unto you, how he befieged Confiantinople in the fecond befie-Moneth of February, in the year of our Lord, 1453, and continued the faid Siege untill the 28 day geth and taof the Moneth of May, and gained the place on the fifty fourth day after he had befreged it; and cauling all the Greeian Nobility (who were in the place) to be put to death; and likewise among the rest, the Emperor Constantine himself: who for a long while before had both required, summoned, and conjured the Christian Princes to lend him relief, but they could not attend the same: For the farality of those times had imbroyled all Christendom in Wars amongst themselves: the Em-All Christen-For the manny or more than a more energies per our reasons and Moravians; the French King against the King of fame engaged per our against the Swifler, the Hungarians, and Moravians; the French King against the King of fame engaged per our reasons and partializes against each other is Wars at the England; Italy was full of Leagues, Confederacies, Factions, and Partializes against each other is me of the England. However, the Pope, the Venetians, and Alphonso king of Naples, did promise to fend thirty Gal- fiege of Conleys to his relief ; and indeed the Venetians did fend thither James Laure, with a gallant equipage, fintinople. but he came too late; for the Turk had already maftered the place, not without a great deal of The Vinctian refistance, which was made by the belieged, as aforefaid, for the space of fifty and four days. And relief came really the Turk did lose many thousands of men before it: and the same day when he gained the City, the Emperour Compantine did not onely content himself to incourage his men to withftand fo furious a monfter : but himfelf being armed , de cap-a-pe , from head to toe , and being feconded but Configurines by a handfull of men onely, did for the space of five hours most gloriously withstand all the Turkish valiant defence Forces. But finally feeing himfelf abandoned by the greatest part of his men, and having but two of Confiantiperfons onely who ftood by him , and ftuck unto him, (viz. Theophilus Paleclogus , of the Stock and nople. Imperial Race, and a Slavonian Slave, though most illustrious and noble in his gallant Actions) was constrained to retreat; and indeavoring to fave himself amidst the multitude, he was either pressed to death, or (as others will have it) trodden under foot, and stifled. And thus the last Christian Constantines Emperour of Constantinople most miserably ended his days, after he had reigned three years and three death. moneths. The Town being taken, you may imagine the cruelties which Mahomet did there exercise . however he could not choose but reverence the dead body of our Constantine, which (as three very ancient Mameldus's of Agypt did tell me) he caused to be fought for throughout the City, and having found it, he took him by the hands and head, and bedewed them with io many tears which flowed Mahomets prefound it, he took him by the hands and nead, and between them with to handy teas which never the from his eyes, as that the standers by could not refrain themselves from weeping: and afterwards rence to Eorcaused him to be enterred in his Sepulchre; but I could never learn where it was; and this reason flantines dead thereof was given me by certain Mahometans: that Mahomet would have but four persons know body. where he was buried, apprehending, left those Souldiers, who being numberless, and had been wounded and maimed by that valiant Emperours own hand, through rage should pull him out of his grave again. And this was the cause, why after his death his head was carried on the top of a Lance. by way of derifion, through the whole City; as also the Image of our Saviour and Redeemer was Indignities of dragged through the dirt in the Streets, with the greatest indignity that possibly could be; having franting head, this Inscription affixed upon it , This is the Chresti ne God.

Finally, I cannot choose but wonder why some have accustomed themselves to assure the World, ours Image.

then his Father. The fixth is that Constantine, for whom Irenea his Mother indeavoured to procure in marriage a Daughter of Francis, being the Son of Leo the fourth, who was chosen Emperour in the year of the Worlds Creation, 4744, and after our Savioursbirth , 782, who was married unto Mary the King of Armenia's Daughter; and not to Charles the Great's Daughter, as some do suppose.

The seventh was Son unto the Emperor Lea, firnamed the Philosopher; who at the beginning of his Reign was molefted and oppoled by Constantine Spartanus, the Son of Andronicus, that valiant Captain, who approaching to kill the young Conflantine, knocked his brains out against a Wall, and falling off from his Horse, his head was immediately stricken off in the same place. Which had been foretold him by Leo the Philosopher. And though this Conflantine was molefted and disquieted in his Reign, yet I fee no reason therefore (as some would have it) to leave him out of the Catalogue of the faid Emperors.

The eighth succeeded Bafilium Porphyrogenism. a man abounding in all luxury, and unlawfull pleafures , whose Son-in-law was Romanus Argiropolus , the third of that Name.

The ninth was that Monomachus Conflantine, who was so beforted with Scelerena his Concubine, as that he became her Slave; however he efteemed and cherished learned men; and be was called the Gladiator, or Great Sword-man. The tenth was that devout and religious Duke, who was more given to his Prayers, than to weild a Sword; so likewise did he heartily detest War. He was taxed of being over-covetous; he died being threescore years of age, having reigned seven years and fix moneths; leaving the Empire to his Wife E. doxid, upon her Oath never to marry, left his three Sons, Michael, Andronicus, and Constantint, should have been frustrated of the Empire.

The eleventh, is this Constantine (though but the tenth of that Name) whose History we have even now epitomized, &c.

Riffotle in his Politicks, and many other Philosophers, who imployed themfelves to prescribe means for Civil Government, have very carefully debated the matter concerning Monarchy, and how it may be maintained. Some have Hieroglyphically reprefented Kingly Government by the Portraiture of a flaming Sword, thereby giving to understand, that the principal end for which it must be used, is to drive forth the wicked. Others would have Kings contemplative, and thought none fit for to bear rule, but such as were Philosophers. Others on it for the most part, that they feem rather to have fet forth their writings to sharpen the Readers appetite, then to satisfie it. The reason may be (as I think) because they had not the Crown on their own heads, and therefore they reasoned so slightly of it. But now I represent unto you one who hath not only fer forth in writing, wherein the confervation of principality confifts; but he did effectually perform that by Governing, which he wifely prescribed. This we shall demonstrate, after that we have in passing along, cleared that which concerns his defeent, his life and manners, as also the degrees by which he was unexpectedly raifed up to the head of the Empire. He was in a very mean condition in fo much The fift effate that Historians report that Justin the first, his Uncle took him from the field, others that he was a poor of Justiniana. Shepherd, and made him his Foot-boy. After that by little and little he made him aftend to honours, and raifed him fo high, that he adopted him for his Son, and then took him to be his companion in the #ulinian the Empire; whereof, four moneths after, he was made the fole Commander, by the confent of the Se-adopted Son of nate and the People. Here it were very fit to confute the opinion of fome, who thought that Justini- his ballard. anus was the Baffard Son of Justin, because in some passages of his inflitutions, he is called his Father. But fince we have before noted that he was his adopted Son, we need fay no more. As for the names which were appropriated to him, the Title of Cafar was, as the name of Ptolomy to the Kings of Expt, to shew that he was the successor of the great and invincible Cefar, who was the first Emperor. So in Justinianas

very pertinently. It is not fit (laith he) that the Imperial Majefty should only be adorned with Arms, but it must be armed also with Laws, to the end that the times of peace and war may be well ruled and gourned; And that the Prince of the Rondans, may not be onely wittorious in battle against his ana governmen, and also by lawful means, may drive away offences of calumniators and evil deers, and that chemis, out also by law me means, may arrow mean of pulsice, as he is a magnificent conquerous after he make himself as careful, and as great a Lover of Julice, as he is a magnificent conquerous after he hath submediate his entire. This is a brave speech, and we need her doubt but that Reap and Aribe hath submediate his entire. facte would have faid fomething very like it , but had it been to have been undertaken by them (perhaps) they would have faid, is it politible? and could not have confirmed by their example what they had very well approved in their writings. Justinianus hath shewed himselt to be none of those great Justiniants his boatters, that can fay much, but cannot do what they undertake to teach others. When he was manufact acitic acit gurated and fee in the Imperial Throne, he mustred a very potent Army, of which he made Capiain Morad, the chief Commander, who with his Son, behaved himself with such courage, that he lost his life there, and brought under the power of his Mafter, Dalmatia and Salanam. After that he the me mere, and to define a most valiant Captain into Africk, to free it from the incursions of the Moors, and to bring it under the obedience of the Roman Emperor, which he accomplished. Lastly he dispatch Belizarius against the Perfians, which he overcome in a very shore space, and triumphed to the Emperours content, who acknowledging the prowefs and good fuccefs that this valiant Commander was perouns content, was a saint other Nations which rebelled againft the Roman Empire, accomplished with, fent him back againft other Nations which rebelled againft the Roman Empire, which he fo forcibly quelled, that according to fome Writers, he was therefore firnamed, Almanicus, Gothicus, Francicus, Germanicus, Alamus, Wandalicus, Africanus, for that he subdued the Almans, Goths, French, and other Nations, Titles which Juftinianus himself especially affected; which was the cause according to the opinion of some discreet men, that made Belisarius fall into diffrace with Tuffinianus, who suspected him of ambition, and that he aspired to the Empire. Others hold that the fulrimanus, who imperced man or amoraton, and that he approximated visiges; and although Got's would have cholen Belifarius for their Kings, after that he had captivated Visiges; and although Augustians a that Belifarius had refuled it, as Proceptus witneffeth, yet Juftinianus began to fall at odds with the Prowels and fideity of fo warlike a Captain, and in place of requiral caused his eyes to be put Fig. 1. Such is I camor believe, fince that Hymonius the Monk writes, that Juffinians; was driven Full initials and did out of the Empire by Florian, and that he was not reftored but by the help of Belifarius, who benot cause Bers- one called back by Justinianus, laid hold fuddenly on this occasion to return into favour, and with a great Army of his followers he marched toward Florian, compassed in with villains, all enemies to Beisfarius, which he cut in pieces, and chopt off the head of the new Tyrant. But methins that Aymon the Monk hath fallisted the truth very much, when he faith, that Beissarius a private man, and being cast out of his command, did ordinarily maintain twelve thousand men to follow him; as also where h. feeks occasion to speak of the credit and authority Belisarius had with the Emperor I stimanus; he faith, that those two persons during the life of Justin, made a mutual promise, that he that fhould be most advanced should be his companion, with his means, power and dignity; and from thencehe would infer, that Belifarius was made General of the Army, as the fecond person in the Empire; and as one who pretended right unto it. If that were fo, how comes it, that when he was made Emperor, he fent not Belifarius at first into Dalmatia and Africa, but committed the exwas man Empeditions to Mondus and John? And farther, it is not credible, that Juftimanus, who faw the Empeditions to Mondus and John? And farther, it is not credible, that Juftimanus, who faw the Empeditions to Mondus and John? pire could not fail to descend to him, would make a bargain with Belifarins, whom he could outstrip There is even as much shew of truth in that which the same Author alledgeth, that Justinianus when he pleased.

and Belifarius going both to one Stew, they faw two beautiful harlots, Amazonians, Sifters, which they brought into their Palace, and that Juftinianus took for his wife her that was called Amoint, and Betifarius took the other, whose name was Antonine: forasmuch as he is the only writer of this matter, and befides that, he hath intermingled to many fooleries with his Hiftory, that at first fight a man may perceive the cheating he hath used. And that which further makes h m to be mistrusted, Jufinimuchad is, that he makes no mention of any other but this Amonine, and did quit Theodora his lawfull wife, Julian murhad 13 that in many no mention of oft in his Reports. But let us leave this digreffion. Justinianus continued legitimate, the with great eagerness to immortalize his name by many Heroick and warlike exploits: therefore (as other suppost- Pompoulus Letus and others write Belifarius was sent back into Greece (without being devested of his Patrician dign 17, or having any act of inhumanity done unto him, wherewith Justinuarus is charged) to prepare himself to wage War with the Parthians. In his flead he fent into Italy, Germanius his retreatinto the Senator (who died of a difease by the way) and Narsers the Eunuch, who by the relief of the Lombard defeated Totilus and Thoises, the Kings of the Goths. Here, before I pais to the other point propounded by Justinianus, concerning the duty of Princes and Lords, I am constrained to make a ftop to fearth out the occasion why this Emperor took upon him to be simamed Francicus, because most men are of opinion that the Romans never conquered the French. As for the Gauls, no man can deny but that they were made subject to the Roman power, as also some part of the the Gault, but French, but to grant that the Franks (who passed over Rhein, and seised on one part of the Gault, which therefore was called France) were ever subjects to the Romans, were voluntarily to contradict the truth of Histories; Yet we may not understand the name Francicus, which Justinianus attributed to himself, to have been any otherwise then by reason of these things, and to insert here all that men have devied to this purpole, is not my intention, holding it but for a mockery to the French, that Julia mianus usurped this tule, not that he ever vanquished or overcame them, but in respect of their great rallmess. Forasmuch as if Theodeberr had followed his fortune well, after he had chased out of Iraly, (ESAR FLAVIUS FUSTINIAN, US.

both the Goths and the Captains of Justinianus, he had notably shaken this Emperor, who hearing of the retreat that Threadebere made into France, faid, that for fear of his Forces (being able no longer to make it good in Italy) he was forced to fly into France, and from thence he took the firname Francicus, as if he had conquered the French; whereupon Theodobers was fo angry, that if death had nor prevented the effect of his deligns, he was refolved to march into Thracia with a ftrong and powerfull Army. And it may be, for this occasion, Aymon the Monk amongst the dignities of justipowerrous rating. Grant may be not as the state of the st this Emperor by infinite acts of valour enlarged the bounds of the Roman Empire, the wings whereof were before that time so near clipt and paired, that had it not faln upon Justinianus, who by his direction knew so well how to raise the flight of the Eagle, as he prevented Throadbers from making a greater desolation by his incursion then he did. But if men are obliged to effect and to honour Justinianus, because he enlarged the bounds, the lands and Seigniories of the Roman world, how much more ought he to be valued for the incomparable care that he took to establish Justice, which Precepts of is the true and principal foundation to keep Commonwealths in their integrity. And for this end, Justice he composed and compiled of infinite particulars, that Divine and admirable Body of the Law, wherein are contained all the rules to live well and honeftly, without the wronging of others, rendring to every man that which of right belongs unto him. Men make great account of that Collection which Aristotle made out of almost an inestimable number of Books, which Alexander the Great had heaped together, and indeed such a diligence cannot be sufficiently esteemed. But if we compare the labour of Ariffole, with that which Justinian undertook, and which he well discharged : we shall find that there is very much more to fay for the one then the other, if we do but confider the prudence which he ought to have, to know how to diffinguish the Times, the Perfons, places, and other circumsfances, (worthy to be observed in him) who being in a great Ocean of affairs, yet knew so well and with so much circumspection to guide things to their proper end, as that a man shall not onely find matter to content himself in the excellent resolutions which he gave upon divers and opposite cases, but also to admire his incredible acuteness of understanding, that he should be able to know with so great dexterity, how to dispose, ordain and accommodate the secrets of the knowledge of the Law, that shorte who excellent or the body or were lefs able might have a raft of that fweet and delicate liquor; and fuch as were most able or the body or indefranding might find enough continually to better themselves thereby. But that which makes the body of the Law wonderful, is, that though it is composed of many pieces, by divers Authors, and at leveral times; yet it is impossible to find out in it any Antinomies or contradictions of one Law No contradicagainst another; though some, very unadvisedly, have endeavoured by reason of some diversities, to ction in the have introduced contrarieties. But these have been so well reconciled by the Doctors of the Law, that Law. if any man should attempt to forge any such now, he would sooner shew his own irrationality and inhumanity, then any contradiction or difagreement in the Law. And for to represent more evidently to all men, the great care and pains this good Prince took to re-establish the luster that is due to the divine knowledge of the Laws; I will here make an abridgement of the method which he obscreed to make up a body of the Law, such a one as that is which he hath left to posterity. Before he entred too far upon the brables and controversies, as the fashion was in former times , which have been plentifully handled, he published the old and ancient book of the Law, wherein were The ancient many ordinances and conflitutions, taken from the Law books of Threodoftus, Gregorius and Her-Law-book. mogenes; so that the said book served in a manner for Imperial constitutions. And because they could not be rule to the parties upon the differences, particulars, controversies and debates than happened every day: this good Emperor, who had a defire to prevent all fraud, appointed Pribanianus, Parothem and Theophilm, three persons of rare knowledge, to take all the books of the ancient Lawyers, and to collect from them, whatfoever they thought to be neceffary and expedient, as well for the ornament of fuch a Science, as for the abreviating of fo many fuits, and of the loathfome prolixities which were caused by the multimde of replies by fo many Lawyers. In this work, these three Persons carried themselves with so much dexterity of understanding, who as that although they left some points of the Law more obscurely then they needed; yet they have deserved an everlafting commendation, having left no one contradiction in the Law, which they have not pulled out by the roots. This collection of confulrations and answers of Lawyers, was called by the name of Pandelts, or Digests. The order of these books is disposed with so much understand. The Digests of ng, as that of fifty books wherein they are divided, there is not one but hath its particular order, Pandeds. diffinguished according to the particulars which are most methodically set down at the beginning of the work. The third book is attributed to Justinian himself, who found such a relish in it, as that he ordered the faid book should be placed at the entrance and beginning of the study of the Law. He that would discourse at large of the admirable singularity which is in the said books, he would make the life of this Emperor swell too great, who divided this abrigdement of Law into five books, wherein he hath so familiarly represented that which ought to be held, as concerning the effential and fundamental parts of the Law, as that there is no man fo foolifh and fortifh, who having read, feen, or taken notice of these institutes, as can be ignorant, what one ought to judge both of persons, things, and Actions, which are the three objects of the Law. But foral much as the diffurbances of the Wars flitutions. had fmucht the clearness of the first book, which was garnished in all parts, as Justinian had intended it, he therefore took that away, and in the place of it made a new Volume to be compiled and compleated, contained in twelve Books; he abrogated the conflitutions of former Emperors, and the opinions of other Lawyers, which, as it were, he framed anew, and quite altered the Method of it from

ARISTOTLE the Stagiritian Philosopher.

Ann. Mund 3600.

Ant. Christ.

Any famous and excellent persons have mainly bussed themselves to find out, whether the Estimation and Repute which men had of Aristotle, was because of his Magnanimous and Heroick Proweffes, or rather for the ineftimable Excellence and Rarity of the Knowledge wherewith he was endued. I will not lofe any time to relate in particular, what he may have done as to Feats of Arms, though I account that the higheft, and most admirable Victories obtained by Alexander, did chiefly proceed from the Counfel and grave advice which he received from Aristotle; fince the account I am now upon, requires not that one should make the hideous flashes of Alarms and warlike furies to found here: and also seeing the Writings which he left to Posterity (though they be as it were but dumb Heralds) do cause the Praise and The praise of Renown of this incomparable Philosopher, sufficiently to thine through the whole World. Such as Arifforte regaze at the vain glory and vanities of this world, and efteem nothing but that which makes a great noife, hearfed by will admire that I proffer our Stagirites Books and Writings to fpeak his praife, being they are dumb Heralds, Orators, which cannot make any noise at all, nor have they any Original or articulate found. But if they will please to have so much patience as to consider with me, that a Lute or Timbrel, or any other Instrument of Musick, should it remain five hundred thousand years in its case, of it self would not make us enjoy its melodious harmony, nor delight our ears, unless the skilfull hand of fome well experienced and able Musician touch it, and causeth it to sound by striking its strings, whereby it will (as it were) speak and be pleasing to our hearing, and add to our content beyond expression. So they must needs grant (unless they be of very shallow capacities) that I do not wander from the bounds of reason, when I go about to make the worth and efteem of this our Aristotle to resound, not upon a Lute, but by those Books which he published. The inequality of which comparison lieth only in this, that though an Inftrument of Mulick in it felf be excellent in all respects, yet if it chance to light into the hands of a mean Fidler, it would not content us so well as being plaid on by an Orpheus, or some other rare Musician. So that the melody we enjoy, is not so much tied to the Instrument, as to him that playeth on it. In like manner, the excellence and commendation of Aristotle, is chiefly annexed to the Worth and Learning which is contained in his Writings, and not in regard of the little, which I am able to specific concerning them. If any man defire more accutely to proceed upon this Comparison, he thall farther find, that one might in a manner maintain some equality therein. Let him onely suppose the Books to be instead of Instruments, and that Aristorle is the Musician that plays upon them. Since therefore we must evidence this Persons Excellence by his Books which he left to Posterity:

Ariftotles

Rhetorick to Theo.foret.

Poetry.

Ariftotte furpatied all the other Philoso-

fo likewife will I here give you a Catalogue of the Books which he wrote, that every one may understand there was no Science, whereof he hath not onely given us a taste, but hath proved him-Arifolieambe felf to have excelled in them all. Whereunto possibly he was moved by an ambitious defire of vain glory, feeing he was supported by so powerfull and dreadfull a Monarch as Alexander the Great was. Nor can he be innocent of this imputation, though many Peripateticks make a noise purposely to palliate and smother such a kind of deformity, which for the most part is a blemish incident to all fuch noble Spirits. Otherwise we must deny Aristotle and other Peripateticke, those Books which are called Acromaticks, Epopricks, or Speculations, which a man must have heard from Aristotle's own mouth to have understood them; fince it is well known that they were penned in fuch a manner, and for fuch an end, as that the common People should understand nothing by them. Which is very plain and evident by the Letter which Alexander wrote unto him, being passed into Asia, and hearing that Aristotle had published some Books, he did chide him. But, if to preferve Arifforle's Honour any one shall reply, that it is not reasonable all things should be communicated so as to be easily understood, because of the contempt they would quickly fall under, nor is it possible they should be so published. Moreover I shall recite the trick he put upon his Scholar Theodoret, whom he had defired to put forthhis Books of Rhetorick, which Theodores accordingly did; and they were so well approved of by Alexander, as that Aristosle grew envious that Theodores should have the Name to have been the Author of such a Work; wherefore he could not contain, but fought a revenge, complaining that his Scholar had done him wrong, by publishing the faid Books, and not fetting his Mafters Name to them. Upon this account it may be, feveral Books attribu- Books were ascribed to him which he never wrote; and which he had willingly acknowledged, had he ted to Ariffold perceived that there had been formething in them, which might have quenched the thirft of his ambition. The Catalogue of them I would have here registred, did I not tear to make this Philosophers Life fwell with fuch Works which he himfelf would not own; befides that we want not other Birds feathers to fer forth his Praifes. Nor need we to borrow the renown of Socrates or Plato, who doubt-Arifforte: Ma- lefs did excell in admirable Knowledge; but chiefly Plato, whose Scholar Arifforte was for about liter. Though in many things he forlook their opinions, and furpassed them in all know-Ariffolies book ledge. As to Poetry, he left fuch clear and copious infructions, that there is no man, but upon just occasion, will grant that he was excellently skilled in it. Some I know do think that this piece was no part of his workmanship, by reason of its familiar stile, and for some other particulars, all which cannot hinder us from believing that Ariffotle was the true Author of it, because it is inferred in the number of those books which our Philosopher made: to be published to the generality, and to be understood without a Teacher, for which cause, he called them vulgar and popu-Ariffults Phi lar. The reft of Ariffote's Books must be referr du his Philosophy, which he divided into wars, locophy.

namely, speculative and practical, which is the most beneficial and reasonablest division that can poslibly be made. Because it is grounded, as well upon the end of Philosophy, which is to make us conformable unto Godby contemplation and aftion, as also concerning the double faculty of our fouls, which is not onely intention for knowledge, but also to defire and long after. And according to this divition, that which remains of Arifforle's books, are fo fitted to the feveral parts of Philo-Jophy, that at this day, without travelling to Athens, though it be a vast time since this Peripaterick Princes death, we may communicate with him at Lyxum, as to all those things which are requisite in Philosophy; and to that part of contemplative Philosophy, he hath left us those beautiful and divine books of his Metaphylicks; in which he hath fo dexteroully plaid the Philosopher by a kind of a Traditional Method (although so hard occult or abstructe) as that the ablest Scholastick Divines of our age, have been sufficiently troubled, to comprehend the method of them. Nor am I Ariflattes Or- of their opinion, who alledge, that the Tracts which he hath framed in his Logical Organ, ought to be gan of Logick referred to the faid contemplative part. For though I would not reject their opinion, who held that the true subject of Logick, was that which many call, ens rationis, yet I believe that Ariffolle never intended that work, fave as a guide to a greater knowledge of the parts of Philosophy, whereunto the most excellent men of our days had respect, when they called it the hand and instrument of Philosophy, and under the banner of this contemplative Philosophy, we must also ranke natural Philo-Jophy, wherein Arifforle was so superlative, as that, whether we compare and march him with other nien, or whether we consider by what Art and Industry ; he hath proportioned that which he hath left to us thereon, we cannot possibly content our selves with the admiration of the rare knowledge of this personage. And, first of all, doubtless he surpassed all the excellent Mauralists that ever were before him, insomuch, that from the time of Thaler, Milefias (who men say were the first Physicians) of Anaximander, and Anaximenes, who a little after the Flood, awakened the Greeian spirits to feek out the caufe of natural things: from that very time, I fay, men could but very obscurely discover any of the causes, except the material cause; so that the former, the efficient, and final caufer were alrogether unknown. As for the Pythagorians, they indeed augmented Philosophy, not a kitle, but yet that which they wrote, was so fluffed with riddles and ambiguities, figured under their Numbers, as that it was impossible to extract any knowledge at all from thence. Plato also and Anaxagorus, who lived afterwards in the fourth age of the Philosophers, did very much clear the Pythagorians mifts, and observed something concerning the four causes of natural things, but that was so imperfectly done, that had not Arifforle last of all set his hand to the work, that part of Philosophy would at present have been loft, as to the knowledge of the causes, the beginnings, and accidents of things in Nature. And herein he surpassed Plato; for speaking of the principles and be-

Author of that part of Philosophy, for it was Thales, Milesim, as Lacreius, and Justin Martyr, first naturalist, have rightly observed; but because he purged it from many errors and riddles, whereby it was wholly disfigured. And because he more clearly discovered the admirable secrets of nature, with so much order and diffinction, as that he feems to have been backward in nothing which the wit of man could order and diffinction, as that he feems to have been backward in nothing which the wint of man could diffover, either for the general declarations of the beginning, caufes, and proprieties of natural the books of the beginning of the declaration of the beginning of the beginnin the books of things, or also for the particular search which he made, as well of the nature, quality and affections Arisbotic Phyof the Elements, and their fecondary causes, in relation to that which concerns and appertains unto the ficks. composure of mans body, so that whether a man would speak universally of the beginnings and common proprieties of natural things, as well inwardly as outwardly; or whether he would particularly discourse the natural and accidental composure, quality, and disposition of every simple, compound or mixt body, he shall find enough wherewithall to content himself in those books which were pun-Aually penned by this Philosopher, and by him dedicated to natural Philosophy. In which, though we meet with fome difficulty, by reason of the prosound sublimity which he useth; yet there is sufficient to fatisfie our curiofity and meditations. Seeing he had so well examined the Wature, Properties, and Differences of the Elements, as also of the Bodies which live in them, that it doth feem impossible a man should covet to know more then what he hath written. He was so fixed upon Nature, that he could Aristotles ernot penetrate any farther, but stopped there. Whence proceeded that gross and absurd opinion which he rors concernheld of the worlds eternity, and of the Souls mortality; which error cannot be attributed to any thing in ing the creatiheld of the mortal eternity, and of the Johns mortality; which this cannot be authorized to any thing it is him, fave a too great defire to bound all his imaginations by the frailty of natural fense, or rather world and imto an over great presumption in him, to prefer Nature before mans Reason: and that which makes mentality of me believe so, is, because that Clearchus, Aristotle's Scholar writes, he knew a Jew, who was not the soul. only very eloquent, but had also a very good judgement, with whom because he oftentimes kept company, it was very probable Aristotle might have learned fomething of him concerning the immortality of the Soul, and the creation of the world. But that by reason of his great wilfullness and obstinacy, he would not forgo his own natural conceptions, though Plato, Pythagoras, and other Philofophers, would rather chuse to renownce their old opinions, to furnish themselves with such new ones as they found in the books of Mofes and the other Prophets, then to proceed in their obstinacy. and always remain at a lofs in the dark rolls of nature; at which flumbling, fome have taken occalion to question Aristotle on the other points of his Philosophy, endeavouring to eternize their own Rashness of names, just as he did who to make the world speak of his actions, set fire on the Temple of Diana at of Arifforte. Ephefus. But such writers thinking to immortalize their names, by censuring so rare and excellent a person, have indeed given men subject to speak of them, in the Assemblies of the learned and wife Philosophers, but it is in the same sence as Pilate was spoken of concerning our Lord Jesus Christ sufferings. This may fuffice as to the first part of his Philosophy, wherein he hath shewed himself to have been of a profound and excelling understanding, he hash not at all degenerated from it in his practicall Philosophy, in which as it feems, he was better verst then in his contemplative part, in regard of his relations to Alexander, whom he was not onely to entertain with contemplative Philosophy, but also to instruct in those qualities and knowledges which were requisite to govern and to administer a Kingdom by. Nor can there be any better rules prescribed then those which he provided on that subject. Into which should a man penetrate, and dive into those secrets, which he discovered whereby to frame our lives to a defired happiness; or would a man but fix upon those means which he ordained whereby to fettle a well governed Commonwealth, he would reap a great deal of content. For as he acknowledged, that a family confifted in many persons, and a City in many families, so he disputed at Aristotles Mofirst. not less learnedly, then acutely in his books of Morals concerning that which we ought to do, the rals Occonobetter to conform our selves unto vertue. After which, in his Oeconomicks he hath prescribed the duty micks and Pobetween a man and his wife, children to their Parents, and fervants their Mafters. Finally, he treated liticks. at large of the concernments of a Commonwealth in his books of Politicks, whence both Princes, Lords, and subjects may learn those things which are entirely necessary and requisite for the continuance and prefervation of a Commonwealth, all which hath not been well pondered by fuch, who nicely Reformers of

go about to tax Aristotle, asthough he had not maturely discussed those things which were expedient

as they have forged against this great Philosopher, deeming that in case they were the first reprovers of Aristotle, they might thereby gain the greatest reputation, could they but make men believe that they had dashed their empty pates against Aristotles Rock. I pretend not to inveigh against any man, but I am ashamed of such, who attributing to themselves great matters, cannot contain themselves within the bounds of their capacity, whereby they would gain far more, then by making themselves ridiculous to all the world. But to leave this digreffion, Arifforle hath crowned our expectations as to Philosophy, and hath thereby gained fo great a repute, as deservedly by the consent of all the Philosophers, he hath acquired the name, title, and quality, of the Prime and chief of the Philosophers ;

which Philip of Macidon knew full well, otherwise it is to be prefumed he would never have given him companied with wildom. Aristotle behaved himself so well with Alexander his Scholar, as that in ginnings of natural things, he distinguished Privation from the matter, which Plato was never able to discover. And upon this occasion he was called the first and principal naturalist. Not that he was the Aristotle the

Moreover he let them have a pleasant place near to Mieza (a City of Macedonia, which barely recommend the acknowledgement which Alexander teftified to his Mafter, but also the reftiution which he made for his Countrey by his great learning. Which faid reflauration in favour of Ariflotte I intended to have only touched upon, had not fome perfons impeded our proceeding with two Allegations which may well be reduced to one head. The first is, they celebrate the praise of Arifinite, who being forum a barbarous place in Thracia, became admirable in numberless eminent qualities. To the manner of which Allegation I shall not refuse to assent; For 1 shall ever grant that there were greater perfections in this Philosopher, then they can prove. But as to the fecond Allegation, I shall never yield, being better instructed of that matter then they can be, for they speak only upon the report of others, but I can alledge it for a truth, having feen it with mine own eyes; however I will forbear to charge them with unadvited rashness, for they are not the first who mistake a white for black. There are excellent Geographers, who discoursing of the platform of the world, could not avoid committing of an Error as well as by their confounding of Thracia, not only with Macedonia, Macedonia and but with Greece also ; and if either of them had diffinelly confidered the bounds, limits, and places not in Thruit. belonging unto Countries, doubtless they had not run into the present inconvenience. There are diverfity of Mountains between Macedonia and Thracia, which do place Libanera, fo clearly on the Macedonian fide, as that doubtless the Author of the Mu-fters new moulded Cosmography, would not take the pains to look into the Map; for with the very first glance of his eye, he would have found, that new Stagira must needs be seated upon the same height with Macedonia, which Philip in dildain of the Olymbians had wholly ruined, afterwards he cauled it to be rebuilded, for the honour of Aristotle whom Alexander cherished, and to highly esteemed even equally with his Father Philip, as - himself said, Because from the one he had received his being, from the other his well being. But as the affections of great men are of very short durance, so he began to fall in disgrace with his Master, after he had lived with him twenty years in great repute. The cause whereof is somewhat uncertain, yet I find that he withdrew himfelf from Athens after he had flourished there a very long time, because Aiffulls vo fome went about to accuse him of having disesteemed the Gods. And searing to be put to death, Anjustis vo-luntary banifia- as Socrates did, so he rather chose to absent himself, and would not purge himself of the faults which were laid to his charge; he took his way to Chalus, the principal City of the Illand of Euboen scituated by the River Euripm (the cause why some men have called it Euripm, at present called Negrepant) where he ceafed not to read Philosophy, but it feems his voluntary banishment augmented his enemies malice. And fome report for certain that he did cash himself headlong into the River Euripus running between the Island of Beatis and the Artick Island, which the Italians now a days, call Streeho di Negroponte; and the reason wheresore its conceived he did cast himself into this River, was a grief which he took, because he could not discover the reasons of the said Rivers flowing and ebbing feven times a day. However in my Cosmography I have noted two other opinions concerning his death, which are very different from this. Be it as it will, all are agreed, that he died at the Age of threefcore and thirteen years, in the Illand of Eubenm, where the Country people shewed Arithater bu- me the place of his burial between two Rocks. Near which place the Turks have a Church yard, which they call Mapperelyt-hyer, that is, where the dead are buried, where I faw many Turks upon their knees, praying upon the Graves of their Fathers and Mothers, holding their hands to heaven, faying with a loud voice, Alla, Alla, rameth toula, that is to fay, O God Almighty, have pity of their fouls. I recovered the Pourtraicture of Arifforle by the means of my good Lord Captain Paulin, in the year one thousand five hundred fourty four. He was afterwards called Barron de la Gaurde, and was alterwards fent Ambassador to Constantinople for his Majefty, unto whom Borborossa Basha of the Grand Stignior, gave a prefent of certain Medals of Gold, Silver, and Brass, representing the Figures of Philip King of Macedon, of Alexander his Son, of Plate and of Ariffeile, which were brought unto him by Turkish and Greek Merchants, who faid they had recovered and bought them of certain Countrey people which lived not far from a Stone Bridge which was very ancient, and was faln down by the overflowing and undermining of Hebrus, a River between Philipopolis and Adrianopolis, which takes its source from the Mountain Rhadopus, and becomes an arm of the Sea, called the bosome of Melas, right over against the Island of Samothracia, in one of the Arches of which Bridge, when it was first met withall, there was found (between two wonderfull great stones, being at least five foot in Diameter) about a load of the faid Medals, the greatest utwhereof were by Merchants carried to Sultan Solyman, and to his four Basha's, who presen them to several great Lords and Ambaffadors which were Christians. I was the willinger to make this small digression to give content unto feveral ignorant people, who wonder how those Medals should be recovered, which may feem to have been extinguished by Antiquity. And because the excellency of this Philosopher hath been elegantly deferibed by a famous Poet of this Age, I thought good to fet down the Verses in this place, which he made on this subject, as followeth:

Stay Traveller, yet stay not bere, For to go father, doft not fear?

'T is the worlds end, half thou not beard Aristotlelies bere inter'de Not whole, nor balf, nor the least part, Of so great wonderment of Art. Call him interpreter o'th' Pole, Natures corrival, and large scrole, What more I might, or cannot fay, Conceive, which I think no man may, But he, compares him to Gods mind, Whole all to each in every kind. Mongst Gods, he was a man mortal, 'Mongst men, like God that can do all.

And were there but thele few verses to express the praise of Aristotle, yet it would be elegantly enough fer forth; for almuch as by them he hath covertly represented unto us the excellency of spirit which he perceived in Aristotle's Works, who will not have him to have treated onely of natural and earthly, but also of heavenly causes. And to speak truth, there is no part in any Region of the Air but he hath examined it accurately in his books of Meteorology. And as to the description of the Heavens, one would suppose he had been transported thither, he speaks so resolutely of them. Nor must I here linger to note, that besides our Aristotle, there were seven other learned men, that bore the same name : Seven learned ger to note, mat being our Aripotic, there were leven other learned their, that out the lattle name is men bearing the first whereof had charge of the Administration of the Commonwealth of the Athenians, who made the Name of the Name very brave and elegant Orations. The fecond was he that wrote on Homers Iliads. The third was an Arifforde. Orator of Sicilie, a very able man, much reputed in his time. The fourth was a great friend of Ischines the Socratick, called Minthius. The fifth was a Cyrenian, a great and famous Poet. The fixth is he, of whom Ariftoxenes makes mention in the Life of Plato. The feventh was a poor and filly Grammarian. These wrote in divers Ages, and the greatest part of their books came not to the hands of the Latins, but as yet remain in the Grecian Libraries.

THE LIFE OF HOMER the Grecian Poet.

Ann. Mund.

Ant . Chrift.

Liny, in the fecond Book of his Natural Hiftory, in the ninth Chapter, doth complain, that we do not fufficiently commemorate the vertues of those excellent Personages, who by their Learning and rare Inventions have enriched and beautified the life of man, expressing himself in this manner, Assuredly we bear but a stender affection and good will unto those who by their labour and industry have laid open and manifested unto us that admirable resplendency which was manifested by Homer. And I might justly be thought to be of the number of those who are here taxed, Should I not have endeavoured to render unto Homer the honour which is due unto him, as being the Prince of Poets. Let us therefore not onely observe the features and lineaments of his vifage, but also consider most exactly the disposition of his Divine Spirit, And that which may augment our curiofity herein, may be the reflecting on this eminent perforages height of courage and as Dion [hrifo]ton very well observes, his harred of vain glory; by his concealing not onely his parentage and despiting the place of his Nativity, but also his own name, whereas other Authors, aswell in the Frontispiece, as throughout their whole works, affect to praise and fer forth Homers praise their own persons and qualities. And however Homer concealed the same, yet I will touch upon his parentage, onely percuriorily, for that I intended chiefly to infift upon his excellent parts. Ephanus the Cumaan Historian doth assure us, that he was the son of a young maiden called Crisheids or Critheis, begotten by a young man called Maonus, who being her Guardian, had got her with child, and pur her off in marriage to Phemio a Gramarian of Smyrna, and a little after his Mother going unto the Bathes near unto the River Meletus, the was there brought to bed, and therefore called her childs name Melefigenes; who being in his youth brought up in learning, became fo great and excellent a Poet, that all the world admired him, by reason whereof he was fent for unto feveral famous Cities, where he was allowed a handlom subfiftence to have the overlight of their Schools, having no great means of his own to live by. Now whereas he was overmuch given to his studies and reading, and that he spent whole days and nights therein, thereby it chanced that he was taken with a rhume, which falling upon his eyes did blind him; and for this cause his name was changed, for instead of Melefigenes, he was called Homer, which in the Cumenean language, doth fignifie, a deprivation of fight, or a blindneft. Which accident however did not depar him from the composing that most excellent and exquifite piece of Poetry, which at prefent is extant among us, divided into two parts, viz. his Iliads and his Odysfor; by the one he related the Trojan Wars: and by the other (under the name of Ulystes) he describes unto us a prudent, sage, and well advised Captain, as the verses of a and parentage.

Homer becomes blind. and thence hi

Greek Epigram, speaking of his Poems, do express.' But least some might doubt, or call in question how there could be fo great a perfection in Homer, and how he should be able to compose such rare books being blind? I shall answer, that though the fight be mans guide, yet several blind men have been very learned, Nature having supplied the defect of their sight, with a superahundance of Several blind knowledge and wit. And to remove this feruple which those feem to harbor who do oppose them-Telves to the effects of Nature; I shall here insert several examples of blind men, who were very famous. As the great Orator Appius Claudius, who was fo highly effected by Cicero and by Titus Appius Clau-Livius; that although he was blind, yet he was chosen Censor at Rome, in which dignity he comported and maintained himself in such an esteem, as his sole Authority hindred the ratification of the Cenfor. Peace which the Roman Senate had concluded with King Pyrrhus, and Diodorus the Stoick Philofopher, who although he was blind, yet he studied in the night time, and played in the day upon the Viol (after the Pythagorian manner) and which is more, he publickly did teach Geometry which is almost a thing incredible, being a Science which can only be practised by the eye. Cajus Auphidius a great friend and a companion of Cicero's having in his youth been made Pretor at Rome, being blind, ceased not to assist and give his advice in the Senate; moreover he made a notable Chronicle in writing, which was much efteemed. Antipater the Cyrenean, and Asclepiedus the Critick, were both Antipater and blind : however they continued their ftudies in Philosophy, and became very learned. Didimu Afclepiedus the Alexandrian, who being deprived of his fight in his very youth, became an excellent Dialecti- Philotophers cian. had fludied all the humane disciplines, and made a rare Commentary upon the Pfalms. Moreover Cifcas the Bohemian is worthy to be noted, who being blind was chosen the Cifcas the Bo-Chieftain of his party, and fo well performed his duty as that he obtained several victories over his hemian Geneenemies. Also Belas the second King of Hungary, whose eyes were put out by his Uncle Coloman Belas King of (who usurped the Crown) being retired into Greece, he did so well behave himself there, as that atter Colomans death King Stephen, Colomans Son, fent for him home, and gave him the Earl of Socines daughter to wife, and after the faid Stephens death, he was chosen King of Hungary, notwithstand-ing his being blind, and reigned nine years, during which time he waged several Wars, and chiefly against Brocus, Colomans Bastard, whom he defeated, and left the Kingdom of Hungary peaceably to his children. Finally John King of Bohemia (who reigned much about the year 1350, was to coura- John King gious, although he was blind, as to come in person to the aid of Philip the King of France his Bahenis blind. Alexander the Great most highly accounted of them, faying, that there was no Poet deserved to be read by a King but Homer; he carried his Alexanders Poems with him into the Wars, and was never at reft untill they lay under his illow, defiring not high efteem of to be deprived of Homers Mule neither by day nor by night. Moreover a little rich Coffer having poems. been found amongst Darius his houshold-stuff, and presented to Alexander admiring the beauty and excellency of the workmanship of it, he asked, What might be worthy to be inclosed in it? And seweral answers being returned, he answered, That for his part he thought nothing worthy to be con-tained therein but Homers Iliads. And the faid Alexander, beholding the place where Achilles was buried, cryed out, O most happy youth! that had so famous a Herald to blaze thy praises, for doubtles had it not been for him, the same Tomb which covers thy body, had also interred thy Memory. Moreover I have been told by some very wise Grecians who lived at Constantinople, that in their vulgar Greek Histories they find that Mahomet the second of that name, after the taking the City Constantinople, being requested by Scolarius, a Greek Monk of that Partriarchy, who was the Monarchs familiar friend, to preferve several ancient famous books which were in the Library of his faid Patriarchy, from the fury and pillage of his fouldiers, who were enraged against the Christians by reason of the great flaughter which they had made of the faid Infidels. The Grand Seignior demanded whether Milhometic care Homers works were amongst those books, which he would have preserved, and being answered that of Homers feveral of Homers works which were never come to the knowledge of the Latins, had been there kept works. fince Constantine the greats time : Mahomet out of a curiofity to fo great an antiquity, commanded his officers to take a strict charge of them, and to have as great a care of them as of his own person, a commendable action in fuch a Prince. And truly the most sublime knowledge of this our Poet Homer The best learnwas fuch, as that I may well fay (as Strabonius the famous Historiographer did before me) That all the ing extracted best learning whatsoever hath for the most part been extracted out of his works. For there was not out of Homers any wife man whatfoever, whether he were a Phyfician, Politician, Mathematician, a Divine, or a Law-works. yer, who hath not grazed and fed upon Homers Cates. Some of them having all their life times received their nourishment and entertainment with him and from him, and others by making use of his writings, having enriched themselves by his works and labors. The Orators by sucking eloquence from him in their declamations. The Grammarians who cannot subsist without him. The Poets who never give over studying and imitating of him. The Geographers do admire the perfect knowledge which he had in Kingdoms and Provinces. And finally from the least Artist to the most sublimest strain of wit, each of them might be to feek, and to learn by his Poems. But that I may not too long dwell upon the rare qualities and ornaments wherewith this exquisite Poet was endowed, and the profoundnels of his doctrine and writings: I shall add that he was not only praised, esteemed, and valued in all Greece, but that although the place of his birth be almost unknown, every City in Greece doth appropriate it unto themselves, covering to make him their Citizen, as it appears by some Greek Verses which mention the fame, viz.

That seven famous Cities, as Smyrna, Rhodes, Colophon, Ithacus, Pylos, Argos and Athens, did contest for his birth. Nor must we believe that which some have written concerning his death, viz. That having demanded of certain Fishermen what they had taken, they should have answered thus, The falle sup- Those which we have taken, we have let go; and those which we have not taken, we carry about us. Which, by reason he could not understand, and being troubled that he should be over-reached by such illiterated people; It is faid he died for grief, but I account it a Fable. The truth is, that having attained to the Age of one hundred and eight years, being overwhelmed with maladies, having lain in a and death, as languishing condition for feveral days together, He died and was buried in the Isle of Chios, as the inhabitants of the same Island have affured me, who shewed me his Tomb hard by the Castle of Valizo, in the ruines of the Castle of Saint Elia, upon which Tomb a long while after some Greek Verses, bearing this inscription, were engraven, viz. In this place the earth doth cover the body of that Divine Homer, who wrote the Lives of the Hero's, or Demy-gods. And being in the Isle of Samos. I was there shown a Sepulchre towards the North, which was a very ancient one, two poles in length and in breadth, being funk very low into the earth and newly discovered, the foundation whereof was Marble, whereupon was written and engraven in old vulgar Greek characters, which were fo wore out that those which were upon the place could hardly know what to make of it, the interpretation of which words, was, Under this Sepulchre of Marble doth lie the body of the great Homer. And as there were Several opini- feveral opinions concerning the place of Homers birth; fo there were as many concerning the times ons concerning wherein he lived, and the reason is because there were several Homers, who lived in several years, which hath caused these doubts. For the first Homer was born at Smyrna, being a powerfull man, a great mer where and Lord, and his Kings Lieutenant or Deputy, who lived about the time of Troys being taken. The fecond Homer was fourfeore years afterwards, born at Chios, being a great Philosopher, verst in the secrets of Nature, and lived much about King Davids time, who I do conceive to have been the Homer which we have at this present spoken of, and whose Pourtraicture I have hereunto prefixed, and the which I did cause to be drawn after an Antick Meddal, which I did bring with me out of the said Island. There was a third Homer, who was born at Salamina, but he was never famous fave for his wealth : as on the contrary our Poet Homer was remarkable for his Poverty, and was not at all known or taken notice of, during the time of his fludies, or whilft he penned those rare things (which usually befalls Philosophers) but rather after his death. Moreover I was conducted by some Greeks to the village of Cardamillum a very folitary place, five leagues from the City, on the left hand towards the Sea coaft, where the inhabitants do believe by tradition from Father to Son (which is also consonant to the ancient Histories) that it was the felf same place where Homers Library was built, and where the said Greeks did affure, that Visions and Ghosts, with such like apparitions were usually seen both in the day time and in the night. And as concerning that other Homer, who is faid to have been born at Colophon, he was an excellent Painter, and Sculpter of Images; wherefore those of that City must also yield their claim, as to our Homers birth, there. But he that was the Citizen of Athens, and who lived in the time of Rooboham King Solomons Son; he was an excellent Orator, and was in such a repute in his own City, as the Athenians permitted him to make Laws, and to Govern them. And the fixth Homer which I find, was a Grecian born at Argos, being both a great Geometrician and a good Poet, but there is no appearance at all that he should have compounded the Iliads. For Herodotm himself doth confess, that betwixt Homers time and his, there was four hundred years difference, which could not be fince that Homers time whom we now immediately have named. The seventh and last Homer was a Maonian, who lived during the reign of Numa Pompilisu, who was so wise and so well verst in the Greek Language, that he was permitted to Correct and amend fuch imperfections as he conceived to be Homersiamous crept into that Speech, which was refined by the judgement of fo excellent a man. And thus you have the several opinions reconciled concerning the several Homers, which were extant: and the famous Homer hereafore affixed, G.c.

THE LIFE OF

S APP HO, the Lesbian Poetels.

Ann. Mund.

Octry was in such a height of esteem amongst the Ancients, as that divers accounted the Poets to have been the first who have written concerning Divine, Natural, Moral, Political, and Military Affairs. Such a one was David the Royal Prophet, who ordained those which were under his obedience to celebrate the praises of God, in Verses and Hymns, and to sing fuch Plaims as had compoled; fuch were Livim, Musem, and orphem among the Greeks. And if Poetry hath been to highly honoured and valued, as that Virgit himself accounted Musem to have been a Prophet, and terms him a most fignal Poet in a sublime degree. I would willingly demand of those who endeavour to obscure that resplendency which themselves cannot behold why the Poets were formerly called Diviners? Was it not by reason that it is manifest such an Art doth add unto mans intellects a more then ordinary wit ? The interpretation which was formerly made of this word Pott (which in the Greek doth lignifie an Artift, or expert Workman) what can it be but skilful, or advised? And truly, a good Poet doth in all places deserve to be acknowledged for a very wife man. No one Science almost being a franger unto him, wherefore Divine Plato calleth the Poets, Gods Interpreters. Strabo him. Strabolib. 1. of Belf admiring this Science, laith, that all the Philosophers, Law-Makers, and Hiftoriographers, have taken Geography. their fundamentals from Homer the Poet. However the effects of Poetry have not onely by the Mufet of knowledge been infuled into men (whereof France more then any other Country feems to abound, as Dorat, Ronfort, Baif, Desportes, and several others) but also unto women, several of that Sex having most ingeniously No man surimployed themselves in that art, and to avoid prolixity, I shall only give you the names of some of them, passingly exwho may ferve as a precious ornament to that Sex. Amongst fuch as have therefore excelled in that Art cellent in the we may well give Proba the first rank, wife to the Roman Conful, who being as Beautiful as Learned, Poetical Art. did in the year of our Lord 424 couch in Heroick Verses, the contents both of the Old and New Testament, as far as the coming down of the Holy Ghoft. Secondly Corinna, who was Ovid's belowed. Elpia the wife of Boetiss. Polla wife to Lucian the Poet, who often helped her husband in his composure of his Pharsalia. Lesbia, Mistris to Catullus. Cornificia the Roman Poetels. Thesbia, who was named the compositress of Epigrams; and the other famous Poetess Corinna, who five times had the advantage of Pindarus the Poet, who in the City of Thebes had publikely challenged her to contend in the Poetical Art, upon which and the other liberal Arts and Sciences, once a year there was a folenminy of representations and prizes. But why should we stand to extend this discourse by a Catalogue of fo many worthy women? Since Sappio the Lesbanite fo firmamed from the place of her birth, one. the Island of Lesbos called Methelin, seated in the Archipelague or Mediterranean Sea, and u-Supplies the far-mous Poetelles best place amongst those who have been verst in this Science; and whereby in her days she attained to high. fo great a renown, as that the Romans exected a Statue of Porphyre, most richly ordained to eternize Roman be formed by the her memory; and Strabo himself had to good an opinion of her as there deement, no one woman may be compared unto her as to the Art of Poetry; which Euglathus doth also confirm in his Commentaries on Dionyfim. And indeed there are very few forts of veries in which sheexcelled not, which cauled me to infert her Picture in this place, which I ordered to be drawn after an old Meddal of hers which I did purchase and bring from the said Island. The like whereof was given (together with several others junto the Barron de la Guarde, at that time Ambassador for the King of France at Constantinople by Sult an Salymans chief Physician. As to her Father, Authors do vary, who he was; fome fay Scammon Dranymus, others Simon, others Eunenymus, or Eumenis, others Erjgim, or Encryim others S. man, others Camonus, and other Etarcus. But for all these supposed Fathers, we must not therefore be induced to believe that she was a Baflard, nor that Cless (who without doubt washer Mother) had miterably profittuted her Chaffity to fo many feveral men, it being onely the uncertainty of Writers which hath caufed these various suppositions concerning her Father: she had three brothers, viz. Laryem, Enryem, and Cheranm; who although they were her brothers; yet our Poetes had several sentiments of them, for by how much the loved and cherified Laryem , by so much did she hate Cheranu , against whom she wrote several Invectives , because he had affociated himself with Rhodopa the Thracian Whore , and with her had fpent the greatest part of his Patrimony, which is the ruine of all those who do suffer themselves to be invested by fuch infernal Hags, who like Horfe-leeches fuck them dry, and are the caufe that they are conftrained to abandon all Amity, Concord, and brothership with their friends and Allies, to cleaveunto fuch a kind of vermin, Sappho then was constrained to estrange her self from her brother by reason of a Whore. And those who read in Horace and Ansonine that Sappho was stranged Mascen-Sappo, fir-named Mafaula. Ia, were miftaken in their most injuriously and calumniously laying to her charge that the abandoned her felf too much unto men and women. Nor can I likewife belpeak her over Chart, or untainted, fince the was too much furprised with the love of Phaon (though fome believe it was the other Sapho called Erenca.) However I think it very unrealonable to Suppose, that she should have perpetrated that crime which will be better concealed then mentioned in this place; and those Authors affuredly were to blame, when they gave her the firname of Majeula, and did not specific the reason why, seeming thereby onely to imply, that ber Actions were more becoming a man, then a woman : Or whether it was by reason of the rare vertes which the composed; or for that the adventured to enter into those fair walkes of Lencades, tuno which none but men durft ever approach. But that which gave the greatest cause of this suspicion, was , that we read the had certain women who were her constant friends and companions, viz. Anagera, Milefransa, Gingyla of Colophon; Eunica of Salamis, Erymna, and feveral others; but, and if upon that account we should suppose her guilty of that borrid crime which is lad to her charge, we might aswell conclude that the other Sapphs, who was a company keeper, a swell as this our Lubian, should be as guilty as her self; and likewise all women in general who frequent

And to return to our Sappho again, we find that the was joyned in Marriage unto an bionest confiderable man, abounding in wealth, named Cercola, or as others Cercylla, by whom the had one onely daughter named Cleis, by her Grand-mothers name. And during her husbands life there was not the least speech of any mildemeanor at all in her , but when she became a Widow, some say (as we have already hinted thereon) that the fell in love with a certain man called Photon, who being gone into Sicily, and the mittrufting that he bore her fior a reciprocall love equal to hers, fell into such a rage and impatiency, that for to free her felf from to difordinate a paffion, the cash her felf headlong from the

THE LIFE OF SALADIN, the Sultan of Egypt.

Ann. Mund. 5137.

Ome men descanting on the approved Axiome, That athing which is ill? got, cannot be of long durance, do think that they have hit the nail on the head, when they urge Saladins History. And then they suppose this Allegation doth halt , because the Historians do recount , that Syracon the Mede Saladins Father, was invested in the Kingdom of Egypt by very unlawful means, viz. By his treacheroully killing of Caliplia the Sultan of Caire (under whom he was a Captain and received his pay) when as he pretended to falute him. And by this means he seiled both the Treasury and soverainty of Egypt. Some writers say, that this Sy. The means raton, or Sarraton, or Syracuin, was not Saladin: Father, but his Uncleand whereby Salathat his Father was Megemedinus. However it was, the Dominion of Egypt fell into Saladins hand by dinactained the means of this perfidious personage Syracon, who afterwards was so highly exalted by the the Kingdom faid Saladine, that he was effeemed to have attained unto the greatest glory that ever any warrior of Egypt. did atchieve. And to avoid prolixity, I shall omit to specific those courses which he ran to compass his did activeve. And to avoid profitsty, train often to precine inforcedures which he rail to compais his ends. This prefent liftory being fufficient to give you his Character, wherefore I shall onely say, That he was the fole Sultan, who was endowed with a surpassing profound prudence and judgement; for he spared neither Gold nor Silver, to gain such men as he conceived might be usefull sultains profits as substitute of the same of those of whom he stood in nead to the same of those of whom he stood in nead to the same of those of whom he stood in nead to the same of those of whom he stood in nead to the same of those of whom he stood in nead to the same of those of whom he stood in nead to the same of those of whom he stood in nead to the same of those of whom he stood in nead to the same of those of whom he stood in nead to the same of those of the same of those of the same of those of those of the same of the same of those of the same of those of the same of t unto him. He conformed himfelf unto the fancies and humors of those, of whom he stood in need, dence and suband had to do withall, not so as to render himself subject unto their said dispositions, but that ha-tily, ving once founded them, he might be the better able thereby, to make his advantage according as it should belt fit for his turn. And the better to compass these his faid defigns (as Bocation the Historiographer writes) he travelled in the difguise of a Merchant throughout all France and Italy, to inform himself of the Christians Forces and defigns; by which means he did fo well discover their intentions, that afterwards taking his opportunity, he quite outed them of all the Territories and Do-minions which they possessed in the Levant: And being sent for by the Damaseens, he went unto minions with they postered in the arrown, their relief, and in a little space of time he made himself Master of the whole Province, usurping the their relief, and in a little space of time he made himself Master of the whole Province, usurping the saladin King fame against his Master Melech Sali. His picture (as you see in in the Frontispiece of this History) of Danas. I brought from the City of Damas . it being given me there by an Armenian Bilhop, together with fome others. Moreover he made himself Lord of Bostra of Malbee, which formerly was called Heliopolis , and of Camelus. To which may be added that it was both leavied and payed at far different times. As it may appear by what Rigordan flux ordinance (who had written the life of King Philip Augustus) faith concerning the difference betwist concerning the both the one and the other contribution. The first Tax, faith he, was raised upon those of statalin Decithe Eastern parts ; the second upon the western Inhabitants , who had not taken upon themfelves the Croifade for the holy journey; and it's well diffinguished by the ordinance concerning this said Decimation which expressed all those who had taken the Croifade apon them to be exempted (and cleared from the paying of their debts) as also the Abbots and Monks of the White-friars; and the Hofpitals. Almshousen and Infirmeries, with their Revenues and the Religious Nuns of Font-Eurauld. But to the contrary, those who had great revenues and enjoyed the high jurisdiction, and did not prepare to go beyond Seas, they were subject unto the said Decimation, and every Gentleman that had not taken the Crossade upon him, was to pay unto the Lord under whom he reforted the tenth part of his proper Goods and Chattels, or of the Mannor or inheritance which he held of him; and if he had not any inheritance which depended of the faid Lord, yet he was obliged to pay him the tenth part of his goods, although his person had any dependency upon the faid Lord. This said Saladin Decimation contained several other particulars which I shall here omit, having onely inferted thefe foregoing ones, to shew the difference between thefe two manner of wayes of leavying of monies; and to evidence the great streight wherein all Christendom then was and whereunto Saladin had reduced them; which (as a man may fay) did confirm all Christendome in a manner to abandon their own dwellings and Countries to oppose and make head against this perfidious and disloyal Saladin, to whom we shall return; and de-Salading max- monstrate what slight account he made of his promises, and the word which he had once palled. Christ. Nat. 1326.

Am forry that I cannot so particularly trace this History, without inserting a just reprehension, which I am necessitated to urge against John the first of that Name, King of France; who although he was a Prince endowed with feveral commendable Graces, yet he could not fo well feafon them, as to make that good use of them which he might have done, by his prudent taking the advantage of a fit and commodious opportunity, to vanquish his enemies: Nor can it be faid that he was backward in giving sufficient orders to his Warlike preparations, he having framed so Puissant and strong an Army against a very inconfiderate handfull of English; for Edward at his landing had not above three thousand English, and at the utmost his Army, after he had united all his Forces, exceeded not twelve thouland fighting men. The fault which King John committed (and which was none of the least) was, that both Armies being quartered fo nigh unto each other , he suffered his Enemy (who was sensible of his condition) to take so much rest, and gave him leave to fortific himself. For this young English man, finding that meer necessity enforced him to fight, that he was unequall in Forces; during the time which was spent in Parleys, ceased not to surround his Camp and to encourage his Souldiers with the Victory, which he already promifed himself, and held for affured, by The Prince of the relief and fuccour which he had received from the Lords Captanx de Buch, Raufon, Muridan. Waterhis great L' Elpaire, Albret, Montferrand, Tartes, and others of the Nobility of Aquitaine : And I find that the faid Prince was to affiduous in the reviewing and animating of his faid Forces, as that he would fearce allow himself time to eat; and so far was he from sleeping, as that he hardly was known to close his eyes till he had gained the Victory: Fencing himself so well between the Villages of Bauvoir, Maupertim, and the Abbey of Novailles, in the Vineyards and Inclosures, as that he quite difinabled the French Horse from approaching him, and facilitated a means for his own men, whereby to defend themselves; The Honour therefore of the Victory sell to the lot of this brave English Warrier , by the indiscretion a d inprovidence of King John of France , who feeing he had permitted his Enemy fo strongly to recruit himself, ought to have forecast with whom he was to deal, viz. with desperate men, who finding that those tenders of submillion which they had proffered to the King (by the intercession of the Cardinals of Perigord and Urgel, delegated by the Pope, to make up the breach between these two Princes) did not at all move the Kings heart, but that he would willfully drive them upon the precipice (as it were) of despair, they were constrained (as a man may fay) to hazard the whole, and play quit, for double : and they taught the King, as things fell out, that there wanted little or no-

g of their having caught Fortune by the Fore-lock. And to speak the truth, he had done far better, if he had granted Prince Edwards Forces a The Prince of leace, who defired but to have gotten off with their lives, and promifed to put into his Ma- Wates his fair ieffies hands, all those Places which he had formerly taken from him; as also to return him all knot profess to the Prisoners, Booty and Plunder, which he had gained fince his return from Bourdeaux: Finally, That he would not take up Arms, nor fuffer his Subjects to Arm themselves, for the space of seven years against the Crown or Kingdom of France. By this means he might have gained the Victory, and needed not to have hazarded the chief of his Nobility, his own Per-ion, and his state, in the very heart of his Kingdom. But I doubt not after the fault was committed, that he repented himself of his bargain; and acknowledged his errour, but it was the fomewhat too late, and when no means were left of raifing up again, those Princes, Lords and Squires, who were most miserably slain in the Battel of Postiers, which was fought on a Mun- The Battel of day, being the ninth day of the moneth of September, in the Year of our Lord, one thouland Politics, three hundred fifty and fix, when there was no time to retreat. That the King of France for his Ranfom did leave unto the King of England, who was to The Article of retain his Title of Lord of Guyenne, all the Countrey of Aquitaine to the very River of Lopys the Treaty of and particularly the City of Engoulesme, with the Province of Angoumois. And here I shall bettign upon make a kind of a digression, onely to tell you how and in what manner this Prince Edward French King did Govern and Rule our Province of Engoumoysin for the space of ten years. He caused that was released. great and stately Tower to be built which is yet extant in the City, and several other Fortresses, and sumptious Buildings. And as he was much devoted unto the Priory of Nonseville (which is finated five leagues from the City of Engauleine, founded by a vertuous Marron named Hild-degarda, as I have read in the old Annals of that Province) he did benefice the faid place extreamly, and caused a great Hall to be built there, and new glazed the Church with stately painted glass windows, in one of which his own Picture (just as I have here prefixed it) was Prince Eddrawn after the life, and being very like two other of his Pictures engraven in Rome, one of wards Pictures which was placed over one of the Gates of the Tower of Cogniac, and the other over the Gate of the Castle of Montignac; which two Statues the Regent Madam Lewis of Savoy, Mother to the late King Francis the first, caused to be thrown down. But to return to our History. The French King, the better to accomplish the aforesaid Treaty, did cause those Cities to be delivered unto the English, which he had promised them: And although he sent them his Letters Pattents thereon , yet the Inhabitants of Engoulesme would not consent thereunto, untill such time as Chandownes, the King of Englands Lieutenant or Deputy in Guienne, entred into Angoulesme, and took possession thereof on the fix and twentieth day of the moneth of October, in the Year of our Lord one thousand three hundred threescore and one; whither alfo, a little while after the Prince of Wales, together with his Princes, came to dwell, mathematical in the strength of the place and its ftrength. Edward the Towards the end of the Year one thousand three hundred fixty two, the Princess of Wales was Prince of brought to bed of a Son, in the City of Angoulefine, who was also named Edward; at whose Wales his son. Christning several of the chief Nobility of the adjacent parts did affift to honour the same; As al. The difference So Peter of Lazignian King of Cypres, who at that time was come into France to follicit the Richard the Christian Princes to relieve the Holy Land.

Moreover the difference betwin feverall Hiftoriographers concerning Richard the Son of Wales his fon Edward, feems to me not at all difficult to be reconciled: For although Richard was the younger being called to brother , having been born at Bourdeaux a great while after the Wars between the Prince the Crowa of

EDWARD Prince of Wales. of Walte and Henry of Castile; yet however he might easily attain unto the Crown of England, either because his brother Edward died before him , or that finally Edward the third King of England of that Name, was pleafed it should be so : whose Testament and last Will I shall here infert, because it may the more conduce to extoll the Praise, Renown, and Excellency this faid Prince of Wales, whom, as it may be conceived, he would have called to the Crower as being the Eldeft of his Sons, in case his death had not prevented the same : Wherefore the faid King Edward the third, because he would not frustrate his Sons succession (who died a year before) would have the faid Riebard, his last Son, to succeed him in the Royalty, in the Year one thouland three hundred feventy feven, and he was Crowned King of England, being but eleven years of age; although King Edward had five feveral Sons, who ought to have King Edward preceded the faid Richard in the Regal dignity, viz. Lyonel Duke of Claurence, John of Gant the thirds fons, preceded the faid Richard in the Regal dignity, viz. Lyonel Duke of Claurence, John of Gant Earl of Dreby, Agmond of Langley Earl of Cambridge, and Duke of Tore, Thomas of Briffell Earl of Buckingham, and the Duke of Gloucester; However their faid Father, rather choic to Earl of Buckingpann, and the Dunc of Giometifer; rowever their laid rather, rather chole to prefer their Nephew Richard before them all, by reason of the great considence head of the Magnanimity and Valour which was innate in him, by inheritance from his eldest Son the Prince of Walts. True it is that Henry the fifth of that Name, Son of John of Gano the Prince of Walts. True it is that Henry the fifth of that Name, Son of John of Gano the Prince of Walts. True it is that Henry the fifth of that Name, Son of John of Gano the Prince of Walts. depoted by on and Illegall proceeding, doth not at all prejudice the right which King Richard had to the Heart the 5th Crown; Nor in the leaft that acknowledgement which was made thereon by King Edward the third of that Name, because that his Grandsathers Will and Testament had entranchised him above any degree or preheminence, which the other Brothers could lay claim unto; or rather this King Richard was promoted to the Crown, by the Law of being prefented thereunto, and nominated and confirmed therein by King Edwards last Will. But seeing we were intensibly engaged in this discourse, onely out of savour to, and in admiration of the Prince of Wales, and that doubtlefs, contrary to all right and justice Richard was Deposed, leaftene should too deeply engage our felves in an endless discourse, we will rather return to our former track, and follow the proceedings of Edward the Prince of Wales , whom we left buffed in folemnizing his Sons Christing at Angeulesme, where we must by no means leave him; for as he was a man of Bufiness, very active and of high Enterprises, we may not conceive that he would fuffer himself to be transported with the over-glibby pleasures of the Angosmoysin:

Edward Prince And that he might not remain idle, in the Year one thousand three hundred fixty fix, he unof Water enga-dertook to defend Peter King of Castile , against his bastard brother Harry , who had made an infurrection against him , wherefore the Prince of Wales affembles all the Forceshe possibly could, and with them did those innumerable memorable Exploits, attefted by all our Historians: And it cannot be denied but that he had feverall weighty Affairs at that time in hand; for although he had made fure of the King of Navarre, who (breaking the Alliance which he had fworn authough he had made ture of the ring of Paparte, who occasing the children much the new King of Caftille) had promited paffage unto fuch English as were to have been fent to the Prince of Wales his aid; yet he had enough to do with the King of France, unto whom the faid bastard Henry was sted for relief; and who by all his subtilities

A difference Historians Tax imposed Edward.

The discontents of the and diversions which he caused to be made against the English in the Kingdoms of Arragon, and near unto the City of Thoulange, could not hinder Prince Edward from joyning his Forces, and exploiting Valiant Feats on that occasion. And here the Historiographers do again mightily differ, concerning some Taxes which were raised by the said Prince of Wales: For, say fome, the faid Prince, being folicited, or requefted, by his Father, to take King Peter of Capitale into his tuition and Protection, he made ule of all the possible means he could invent, to raise and pay that Army which he then Conducted, and that having exhausted his Exchequer in that War, he assembled the Heads of all his Provinces at Angonissme, and imposed a Tax upon the people, of ten fold Tournois, for every Fire (the rich paying for the poor one year) which faid Tax was to last five years (others say the Tax was far greater) whereby there arose a general discontent, as we shall hereafter declare: However others, who have run through Froi ard, Hiftory, do fay, that this fame Prince of Wales, because he would not oppress the people with extortions, (having not wherewithall to make his Army substit) did borrow vaft fums of Money of his Father the King of England, and even did cause all his Cupboards of Plate, both of Gold and of Silver, to be melted down, and to be Coyned: But and if we narrowly pry into both these reports , it will not be hard to reconcile them ; for it is not probable that King Edward having engaged his Son in a War, and finding that he was in want of Moneys, should have railed a sum of Money by way of subsidy, to surnish him. For the repayment of which, the said Prince Edward should have afterwards been constrained to have laid the faid Tax upon his fubjects; and to speak the truth, there cannot be any other construction made of the foregoing passages. Besides, it is evident the discontents and distates of the inhabitants of Angoumofin , and the rest of the Aquitans , did not arise thence, but from the ill will they bore unto the Engliss, and by the regret which they had to fee a stranger sleece them, thereby to enrich their general Enemy: so likewise do I know that there were other occasions of discontent; and especially, because Prince Edward could have made up that fum of Money which he had borrowed of his Father, by the ranfoms of these Preunfals, and French Nobility which he had taken, amongst which the Earl of Nerbonne was one, who together with the reft, he released upon their bare words and promites. However, this new Imposition, together with the ill-will which the said Angosmois bore unto the English, who became too much pussed up and single slice of the much pussed up and single slice of the mile less all the Dignises, preheminences, and Offices of e Countrey, without the admitting of any French man amongst them, which did beget such a hearte Country, without the summing of any Frence in an amongs, army mine a coggi tion a neart-ining in diversible a delength the Lords of Lawrich, the Earls of Remarks and Perspect 3 and feve-lothers were on the point of sobelling against Prince Lawrick. However they rather choice to apply themselves unto the remedies of Judice, and restreed themselves unto Charles the title of that Name, King Prince Edward of France, and there became Plaintiffs against Edward their Prince; who was summoned to make his summoned to make his fundamental to the charles of the Char Personall appearance in the Chamber of Peets (or in the Lords House) at Paris, to give satisfaction on fiver, the complaints of the people of Aquitane. Who answered, that indeed he would appear there, but it should be with a Casket on his head, and threescore thousand men at his heels, (to which others adding one Cypher increased it to fix hundred thousand men.) And thence began that furious War which was fo violently purfued on both fides ; though it fell out ill for Prince Edward, who befides the great loffes which he suffained, got a fit of a Dropsie, or a swelling, occasioned (as it is surmised by some) through Prince Edward poylon which was given him. And being reduced to fo great an extremity of weakness, as that he was fals into a forced to be carried in a Litter, he retired himself into England, in the Year one thousand three hundred Dropsie, threescore and eight: And during his abode there, you may imagine how things were carried on in France for in the Year one thousand three hundred seventy two, Henry Hayes the Governour of Angoulefme was no fooner taken at the fiege of Soubize by the French , but the inhabitants of Angonlefme, being cloyed with the English taking the opportunity of freeing themselves, furrendred the City of The City of Angontefme (the place of my birth) into the hands of Charles the sith of that Name King of France; Angontefme who to acknowledge their fincere affection towards him, did grant unto them feverall Priviledges and jurrendred to large Immunities: And by their example the reft of the Aquitans did fuccessively proceed to shake off the King of the English yoak; nor could King Edward the third ever after reclaim them, although he did promise France. them to abolish all those new burdens and Impositions. Nor do I here pretend to justifie the said Prince Edward, therebase leffen or suppress the right which our Kingshave unto Aquitane; However I must needs aver, that it would be a difficult matter to meet with a more Generous and Magnanimous Prince than this Edward was, unto whom all diffressed and oppressed Princes took their refuge, by his means to The King of recover their Liberties. We have already touched upon his endeavours to affish Peter of Castile; and Majorca comes I shall also hint upon the King of Majerca's repairing to Bourdeaux unto Prince Edward to demand to Bordeaux relief of him against the King of Arragon, who caused this poor Infular Kings Father to be put to lief of Prince death in prifon, and detained his Lands and Dominions. After Prince Edward had heard his com-Edward, aplaints, he promifed him all possible relief, and took him to be his Son Richards Godfather, who was gainst the K: plaints, ne promise and a possible to the first plaints, ne promise and possible having of Arragos, born at Bourdeaux: Notwithstanding he could not re-establish him, for Henry King of Castille having of Arragos, born at Banforn of one hundred thousand Dancase is Goddather furprifed this King of Majorea being fick, he fet him at a Ranfom of one hundred thouland Duccates because he was in company with the Prince of Wales, when he restored that disloyal false Peter unto the P. E. for. Kingdom of Caffile: After which, the faid fickness killed the Majorcan King. And as to our Prince Edward after he had thus valiantly finished the course of a most Renowned life, he deceased in the Year of the Incarnation of our Lord, one thousand three hundred threescore and fixteen, at a Palace near unto London: much about the time when (at the Affembly of Bridges in Flanders) the Marriage of Richard and his fon his Son with Mary daughter of Charles the King of France, was by him fet on foot; which faid Match Richards marwas fo long and diverfly debated before it could be concluded, as that Pope Gregory being much offen- riage. ded, for meer fpight left Avignon, and returned to Rome.

However because that particular doth not much contern Prince Edwards life, I shall not fay any more thereon, but rather proceed to recount unto you the diffeyalty and perfidiounnels of Peter of Caffile, The diffeyalty who finding himself restored to those Dominions and Territories for the which he contested with Hen- and perfidioulry of Caffile, and that also those of Toledo, Lisbon, Galicia, Seville, and severall other places in Castille, nets of Peter were come to do him homage, he did pay them in the like Coyn, as usually such unworthy Personages do of Castille to recompence those who have contributed to their re-effiblishment; For when this base, false, and trea- Prince Ed. cherous person found that Prince Eaward did press him to pay those Forces which he had levied for to ward. recover his Countrey again, this fneaking hound, retind himself to Seville, on a pretence to leavy the Moneys for the faid Forces payment, promiting to return within tome certain weeks, by himfelf prefixed : The Prince of Wales expects his performance, the time expires , and no payment, but in words : whereupon the Prince fent fome Gentlemen to know the occasion of this so long delay, who were fent back by Don Pedro with this answer, alledging that he had already fent the faid Moneys by his own men. unto the faid Prince, but that they had been excountred by the way and robbed: And by fuch like shifts and pur-offs he fo long detained the Prince of Wales in a bootlels suspence, as that his Forces by a long and redious expectation, being weakeneded disbanded, he found himself in a fad exigency; for he was constrained to retire into his own Country, without the receiving of one farthing token, and was forced to oppose Henry of Caffile, who the buer to reward him for the relief he had afforded the perfidious Don Peter endeavoured to invade fore of his Territories in Guyenne

However, the Prince of Wales fould out a means in time to frustrate all the faid Henry's defignes. although it was not in his power to inder the Aquitanians Rebellion, who finding themselves mightily oppreff by the excessive Impossion which was laid upon them, for to supply those sums of Money which Don Peter should have pared; revolted against Prince Edmard, and dispossessed him of all Gugenne; which was all he got y aiding and reftoring the faid perfidious, ungratefull Don Peter of Caftille , &c.

everall men have over-much bufied themselves to find out, upon what account this Emperour was honoured with the Title of Charles the Great : Nor will I fatisfie my felf with the reason which is thereon given by the Author of the Triumph of the Nine Worthies; being unwilling to believe that because this faid Charles did kill that Bear, whereof he maketh mention. he was therefore firmamed the Great, although I do not deny, but that the Counties of Poiltos, and my native Country of Angoumos fin, were shrewdly insested by this surrous beast; but to believe that for this sole action he should have been qualified with the Title of the Great, I must defire to be excused. And will rather choose to derive the cause of that said Denomination, from the Heroicall and Magnanimous Exploits which were by him performed, and which made him to excell beyond the reft of the Kings, Princes, and Famous pen of his time, in the fame manner as the Victories the reit of the Kings, Princes, and ramous men or his time, in the tame manner as the Victories and Conquefts of Alexander (the Son of Philip the Maccador King) did acquire unto him the Property and Poffession of the Title of Greet. Nor shall I dare to adventure upon a Comparison betwirt them, this Discourse being not capable to contain their incredible number of Actions, red to Alex However, I dare be bold to affert, That this our Charles, was not at all inferiour to Alexander, as the description of his Life, Victories, and Valians Archievements, will sufficiently manifest. He was born at Ingelbeim (according to the opinion of the most part of the Historians) which is a was norm at inguissism (according to the opinion of most part of the surforans) which is a place two German leagues distant from the City of Agreece, or (as others will have it) from Lings: He, together with his Brother Carolo Main, Succeed King Pepins, (the first of that Name, and the first that was called The Most Christian King.) This two Brothers thread the Kingdom of France, in such a manner, as that Charles, who was the elds Brother, had for his part France, and Aquitains: which before were fallen unto Pepis their Father by the divition which he made with Carolo Main his Brother, who in the Year feven bundred forty and feven, went to Rome, and there became a Monk, and retired himself unto the Mount called Sorages, where he caused a Monastery to be built, and had defigned to have remained there with fomewher Religious men, but because that place was too publick, and that he was refolved to fequefter hincelf from the world, and from the frequent ng of fuch of the French Nation , who came thinher o falute bim, he removed to Mount Coffin, which is in the Land of Samos, and there shut up hiness in the Binedillins Monafiery, where he ended his days: Others, however, do believe that he died at Vienne, upon the River of Rbyne, in the Year feven hundred fifty four, whence he was carried and buried in his

Moreover the Kingdom of Soiffons, with the Territories beyond the River of Rhone, fell to Carolo Mans share, the Brother of our Charles , who having reigned joyntly together with his faid The death of Frother for the space of two years, deceased on the fourth of December, in the Year after our Sa-Carolo Man, viours Nativity feven hundred feventy one, which was the third year of Charles his Reign; and after ther, whereby Carolo Mans death, Charles was made King of all France, by the generall confent of all the States Charles beof the Kingdom; which particulars I thought good to specifie in this place, northat I do intend comes Soveto track the succession of the times in which he lived, and to specific all those generous Actions which raign of all he so happily effected: But because I have resolved to follow quite another strain in this Discourse. France. and to take a far higher rife, that fo I may the better descend to describe this great Monarchs Magnanimous Actions. But first I shall give you a kind of a Catalogue of his Stature, Manners. and usuall Exercises. Turpin the Archbishop of Reims tels us that he was of an extraordinary Sta- The Statute of ture, a Body very well proportioned, being eight foothigh; his Face was a span and a half long, Charles and his and his Forehead was one foot in breadth, his Head was thick, and the diffance between his Eye-other Features. brows was a span long, his Nose was little and flat, his Countenance was fierce, and his Eyes were Lion-like, big, green; and sparkling like unto a Carbuncle; infomuch as when he was transported with rage his very countenance did frighten and terrifie his Enemy. At his dinner he usually had a quarter of Mutton, a Peacock, a Hern or Crane. or a couple of Hens, or a Goole, or a Hare, besides the other services at the beginning and ending of his Meals; his ordinary custom was always to have four Messes, besides the roast meat, which feems to be an excessive Ordinary for such as had not so good an appetite as himself; for had he not eaten thus superabundantly, he was troubled with terrible gripings and crudities of the Stomack: He was fatisfiedwith a very little Wine, and drank but thrice at most, whence sprang the Proverb. Ter bibere in menfa Carolinum , You must dring but thrice at Charles his Table ; which is the more A Proverb to be admired, fince there are but few Germans who do not exceed that way. In fummer he did concerning his usually strip himself and sleep two or three hours at Noon-tide, after which he did eat some Plums: moderate usually strip himself and sleep two or three hours at Noon-tide, after which he did eat some Plums: He was clad after the French fashion, and always wore a short sword hanging at his girdle, in the pommel whereof, his Seal, being the Coat of his Arms, was engraven; and at the Sealing of any Charles his Laws, Ordinances and Statutes, he was used to say, Behold the Sword that shall maintain my Or. And that which is told of his extraordinary strength is almost incredible, as that with easehe could lift up a Knight in full Arms, from the ground as high as his head : and with his hands he Charles his would open and extend four Horfe-shoes being joyned together . He had such an extraordinary force strength, in his Arm, as that with one blow he would cleave afunder a horse-man in full Arms, and his horse to boot fo that doubtless he laid on with a good heart. And as his Stature and Corporall firength was great , far greater was his Magnanimity and Courage, as his actions have evidenced, which I fhall onely fuperficially touch upon, in this relation, remitting the curious Reader, who fhall be defirous to know those particulars which I may have omitted, to the writings of several other Authors. The fifth Before he had put his foot into the Royal ftirrup , and during King Pepine life , he commanded that Comman Army which his Pather had raifed against Warferns Duke of Aquitaine; he subdued Poitton, Berry, which Chales Army which has ranged having a superior of the variety of the control of the province of Austrian Early, the one Earl of Austrian 2, and the other of Position: And Anising were killed; the one Earl of Austrian 2, and the other of Position: A finitive celles ter this Victory he passed from Application, into Biscay, to help the Biscains, who were almost quite distracted by reason of the frequent Invokas and Plunders of the Saraceni, who as soon as Charles the Great was come amongst them (foreseeing that he was to be their Deliverer) they Charles defeats took to much heart of grace, as to re-assume their lost hopes, and defeated the Saracene. And the Saracene in having this successfully performed their Exploits, he was no sooner called to the Royal Dignity "rifety." (which was in the Year of our Lord feven hundred threescore and nine) but the self fame year he was confirmined to raile a powerfull Army to march against Hunault Earl of Provence, who having War. fallied the remainder of Warfers, the Duke of Aquitaines, Forces (whom Pepin had caused to be taken and ffrangled) had without any refiftance almost at all usurped the Dutchy of Aquitane : In this War he was to fuccefstull and happy, as that the inhabitants of Xaintongo, Poiltenins, and of Angamoyfin having rejuted to rife in Arms for Hunants , against their King , he forced Humante to flye for his latety , and to take Sanctuary with Duke Long in Gafcony ; who although hedid not fide with Charles the King, yet apprehending his too near approach with his Army towards his Limits, delivered the faid Hunault, together with his Wife and Children unto the King, who were lest priloners into France; and by this means the King was reconciled to Duke Long, and the Aguitaine War was also ended. ry present a strong place, situated upon the River of Dordonne, hard by Libearne in the Bourdelois) tomake head against the Saracess, who at that time did dwell beyond the Rivers of Gironde and Dordonne; In the enfuing year the whole Monarchy of the Kingdom of France fell unto him by the death of his Brother Carolo Man; whose Widow being accompanied by a brave and gallant French man of great power named Anthor, or Anthony, did retire her feld, together with her Chiles, dren, unto Taffilon the Duke of Bavaria; and from thence fhe transported her felf towards Differ the King of the Longbards. For the which, Charles the King was very wroth, and by reason hereof he repudiated Hermingards, the said Differs Daughter: (Others write that her Name was Theodora, and that the was Differs fifter,) whom he had married the year before by the command of Bertha his Mother: Although Paulin Amilia doth attribute the cause of these two Princes enmities by reason of the said Hermingarda's Divorce, which caused several and many cruel Wars betwixt those Kingdoms, and finally the subversion of the Longobardians. The original of which War was founded on Differs pretending to have a hand in the dividing of the Kingdom of France. and because he fomented a partiality between King Charles, and the Children of the late Carolo Man his Nephews; and that which exasperated King Charles the more was, because Difter had harboured Hunault his ancient Enemy, who having obtained leave of the King to go in Pilgrimage to Rome , fided with Difter, who made him General of his Army , and had given him the keeping of the straight Passages of the Alpes. However King Charles being sent for to relieve the Pope, pasfed over the Alpes, and waged fierce and cruel Wars against the Lombards, as well in the Province of Piedmon, as in the place called Moureri, where he fo valiantly charged Difter, as that he constrained him to shut up himself in the City of Pavie, and where the said Differ did so valiantly defend himself, together with the Longobards, as that the French lay fix moneths before the place, by which long fiege Differ being tyred out, befides the contagiousnels of the Plague, having much diminished his Forces, he was constrained to surrender himself unto King Charles his mercy, who afterwards banisht him and his Wife, and Children, unto Liege. And thus in the year feven hundred seventy three, the Kingdom of Lombardy in Italy was ended, which had lasted 224 years, (or 213, or 205, for the Writers and Historiographers do so much differ) after Differ had Pepia, Charles Reigned eighteen years. And in the year feven hundred eighty one, Charles caufed his younger fon Crown'd Son Pepin (whom he had by Hildegard , Daughter of Hillegrand Duke of Suevia) to be Crowned King of Lambardy; the Confines of which Kingdom (by the Emperors confent) he caufed to be feeled by that which is contained between the Appenin , the Alpes , the Lake of Garde , and the River Mincio, or otherwise, according to the ancient Lombardian Chronologers, by those Territories which are separated from the reft of Italy , by the Rivers of Pau , and of the Rhin Boulonois. After Pepins death, which happened in the year eight hundred and eleven, on the eight day of July,

Birtard made Charles gave, (in the year eight hundred and eleven) the Kingdom of Lombardy unto Bernard his Grandchild, Pepins Son, to whom he gave a certain person named walie to be his Governour, who was a wife and experienced man , Son of Bernard, his Uncle, who he left at the fiege of Pavie, when he went first to Rome. He commanded the young King and his Governour to repulse the Barbarians, who with a Fleet ranfackt and burnt all the Coaft of Italy : which was a little after performed by Hermangorus the Count of Empas, who lying in an Ambush, by Majorea, surprized the Saracens , who were on their return from Sardinia into Spain , their Ships being laden with Booty, the greatest part whereof he took, and recovered, besides the great Booty which he found, above five hundred Sardinian prisoners, which the Barbarians were carrying away. During the remainder of King arles his Reign , France had feveral Wars , which the King fo ordered and disposed, according to an excellent vertue and faculty, as that they but little endammage the people of France: Whereby this Prince's Magnanimity is highly to be extolled effecially in his having quelled his enemies, without the burdening of his own Subjects. And amongst others, the Saxons, with whom he warred fo long, as that he overcame them, and quelled them eleven feveral times; times by King and yet he could never reduce them to that perfect fidelity nor loyalty which Subjects do owe unto their Prince, although he endeavoured by fair means to gain them, by punishments to suppress the treachery of those which were feditious, and by force of Arms to countermine their perfidiousness and revoltings; till at length, being weary of their impieties, and of the effulion of their bloud, which he had been forced to continue for the space of thirty and three years ; he rather chose to transport them, together with their Wives and Children into France, that so they having changed their dwellings, and having fucked in the sweet and mild air of France, they might become better fettled in their obedience towards their Prince, than they were before : And gave them all the Coast along the Ocean to inhabit, commanding Liderick the Lord of Herlebeck (who was great Forrester or Governour, and Admiral of that Countrey (the same which we now call Flanders and Brabant, which is the reason those inhabitants do yet retain the Saxon Language) viz. to have a watchfull eye over them, and to keep them there secure. And that their former habitations might not remain unpeopled , he sent the Abrodifes thither in the year after our Saviours Birth eight hundred and five. Infomuch that all men who heard of Charles his happy Victories , and admirable Successes could not choose but admire them; and some others again were so surprized with astonishment, as that they Submitted themselves unto him, befeeching him to admit and preferve them under his Protection, and to fave them from the incursions of their Enemies , And amongst the rest, that part of Spain , which was infefted by the Saracens, not knowing which way to turn themselves, nor whole affiftance to crave, to avoid the fform of the Sarracens inhumanity, had recourse unto King Charles, whose Puiffance was dreaded throughout the whole world, and who once before had given a proof of his Prowefs againft these Insidels, by the relief which he afforded the Bifeaians in the year of our Lord feven hundred fifty eight, before he was King. And after feveral folicitations from the Spaniards, King Charles King Charles caused his Army to march and to fight the Sarracens, in which occasion the French men thewed themselves so valiant, as that they mastered the Town of Pampeluna, which they sacked, and Pampeluna found abundance of wealth in it, which the Sarracens had plundered almost throughout the whole from the Sarworld: And to ftrike a terror in the reft, the King caused the Walls of Pampeluna to be demolished . racens by which means Sarragoce flood out but a fhort fiege, and furrendred it self to King Charles, who sarragoffa tacaused Ibnabal to be acknowledged there for their King, he having been formerly driven out by Abutaurm, and Denisturm, who being startled at these successes, came in unto King Charles with Prefents, and furrendred themselves his Tributaries. And the War which he waged in those parts, was fo fierce, as that all Spain trembled at the very Name of Charles; and abated very much of the Sarracens power, who could never be subdued by any body before, save by himself. Wherefore Adelphonfus the fecond of that Name King of Esturia and Galicia (firnamed the Chaste) having obtained a fignal Victory over the Sarracens, wherein he deteated threescore and ten thousand men. The Sarracens fent Ambaffadors unto King Charles, laden with the Enemies spoil, acknowledging that he accound defeated by Ated the Victory which he had gotten, to have been effected by his means. And with the reft of the King of Effufaid spoils he caused two Monasteries to be built, viz. Oventenosa and Esturiossa. But whereas those ria and Galicia Infidels did continually break forth again upon the Spaniards, King Charles fent thither Adamarus Count of Ganes, Hermongarus Earl of Empus; and the Lord High-Constable Bouchard, under whose Conduct, he acquired ten fignal Victories over the Enemies; having fultained but one memorable loss, during his Reign, and that was at the battle of Ronceuaux; where, by the Treason of Ganes The battle of (who being corrupted by the great Presents and Gifts of the Kings Marsillon and Baligam) delivered Romenaux lost into their hands, Rowland and Ollivir, with the flower of the Nobility, and the choilest Troops of by Treason, France, which were all put to the fword; for which Charles fought a revenge and obtained it in this Charles his rewife: Near the River Ebra, hard by Samagousa, he defeated thirty thousand Sarracens, and with his venge of the own hand kil'd the King Baisgant, and afterwards caufed Pinabet, Ganes his Coufin, to be hanged, Saturation, because he was accessory to the Treason; and as for Ganes himself, he was sentenced by Neymes of Bavaria, and the other Nobles of France, to be quartered and pulled afunder by four Horses at Laons. True it is, that in King Charles his return from Spane, in the year feven hundred feventy nine. his baggage was almost all plundred, but it was not by the Sarracens, but certain Gascoons, who were displeased at the Souldiers making a longer stay in their Country then they defired they should, which Robbers were to well verift in the advenues and coafts of the Country, as it was unpossible to track them. and did so cunningly carry on their Pillagings, as that the best of the Army mistrusted no body save Ibnabal; and had not this faid company of Thieves been discovered by chance, the blame had remained upon that poor Prince: But they at that fame time brake forth in a publick way under the Conduct of one Burgandus, (of whom mention is made in a Council which was affembled at Thionville, and in an Epiftle written by Pope Nicholas unto the Archbishop of Bourdeaux) and who ruined and plundered the very Churches; and therefore in horrour and deteftation of fuch facrilegious villains, all Robbers Whence the have been fince called by the name of Brigands. Nor had Charles left them unexterminated, had not Name of Brithe Saxon Wars hindred him, they revolting against him, in the year feven hundred and fourscore : gand or Robber And because we have already discoursed of that Rebellion, Disloyalty, and how they were punished, we will not trouble our felves further with them, but will turn towards the Brettons, who also in the year feven hundred fourfcore and fix, did begin to rife in Arms, and would not obey his Commands, revolt and are disavowing that they owed any obedience to the Crown of France, but they were quelled, Charles quelled.

fo well abate their pride and prefumption, that they were glad to cry him mercy, and to fubmit.

In like manner Tassilon the Duke of Bavaria was fubdued by King Charles, who (by the Council of his Wife, the Daughter of King Differ, to be revenged of that which Charles had done to A War against ther Father and Mother) had leagued himfelf with the Huns, and railed an Army to his own confusion, for hearing that Charles was arrived as far as the River of Lech, which divides the Territories who submits of Germany and Bavaria, he was conftrained to submit, to humble himself, to resign his Interest, and is deposed and to deliver his fon Theodon for an Hostage, wherewithall Charles not contenting himself, he would also have the Father to boot, and caused both of them to become Friars, in the year seven hundred eighty eight: And deeming it not yet sufficient to have purged that age of such Rebels, he took from him his Durchy of Bavaria; in which he placed no more Dukes, but disposed of it unto Earls: Nor will it be needfull to infift any longer upon the feveral Nations, People and Provinces which were fubdued by this Puissant Monarch, fince our Histories publish nought save the Victories by him acquired. And so great was his renown throughout the whole world, as that his greatest enemies (against their wills) were enforced to curry favour with him, to league themselves with him, and to acknowledge Several Prinhim to be their Superiour, witness the presents which the King of Persia (who entitles himself to be ces feek to the King of King:) did fend him , which was rather by maxime of State, than for any good will he Charles for his bore him : And to fpeak the truth, the Greeks did not only dread the Puissance of fo great a King, friendship and but the Romans likewife; whence the Greek Proverb feems to have had its rife, Englished thus,

The Lord of Huelel named Aze, did in like manner fend the Keys of his Town unto Charles. Abdelle fon of Ibimangus the King, came from Mauricania unto Aix Lachapille, to Charles, With feveral Presents, and in such an humble manner, as it sufficiently demonstrated how great a blishe effected it to enjoy the good graces of a person whom Hirenus the Emperor of Constantinople so much reof Configuration of Con ror of Constantinople, which was doubtless a great deal of honour offered unto Chartes: who notwithstanding denied him; at which he was so much displeased, as that he would needs vent his wrath upon the Territories of Spoletto and Benevente; where he lost abundance of men; so likewise did the Ambaffadors of Abraham King of Barbary come unto Charles, bringing him other rare and magnificent Prefents; to that it feemed all the feveral Monarchs of the world did ftrive to embrace this French Monarchs friendship. And to conclude, we will onely here add the alliance which Acacinius the threefcorth King of the Scors made with him in the year eight hundred and four ; which was ever fince that time kept and observed by the Scots, so likewise did their Kings add unto their Coat of Arms, adouble ftreak of Gules with Flower de Luces round their Scutcheon, to flew that the French alliance hath conduced much to the support of their Kingdom: Which is the chiefest consideration that made me speak of this League, before I did enter upon the discourse of Charles his Actions after he became Emperor, that fo the world may take notice, that this League with Scotland was made whilst Charles was yet but King of France. Wherefore after an infinite number of Victories obtained, Charles was declared Patricius or Senator of Rome, by Pope Adrian, in the year of our Lord, seven hundred seventy three; which was a degree to succeed in the Empire, just as the High Constableship, or Prince of the blood of France, was a step to the Crown. And finally Charles attained to the Empire of the Romans, on the 25th day of the moneth of December, in the year of our Lord eight hundred and one, and the three and thirtieth of his Reign; which was the day of the celebration of the Birth of the Saviour of all the world; During the solemnity of which day, Pope Lee proclaimed Charles Emperour of the Romans, by the general consent of all the Princes, who from all parts of Christendom were assembled at Rome to see so Great and Magnanimous a King. After which the Pope put the Imperial Crown upon his head : Whence it came to pass that ever since till this very day the Emperors are Sacred, and Crowned by the Pope of Rome; At which time all the people did cry out together, Happiness, long life, and Viltory to Charles Augustus, Divinely Crowned, most Great and Peaceable Emperor. Some there be that would need descant upon the like New Creation, allegorizing upon the comparison which they make between the Saviour of the World and Charles the Great, because that on the same day whereon the Saviour of the World was born, Charles was installed in the Imperial feat; as presaging the restauration of the Koman Empire, which fucceeded in his Person; because that having been transported into Greece, it was faln into the hands of those who were not of the Imperial race; Others do Philosophize upon the day whereon Charles was declared Emperor. But for my part I fee no great reason they have so to do, in case we do but reflect upon the new Reformation of our Kalendar, which doth abolish such kind of formalities; which I shall leave to return to our new Emperor, who continued in the performing of his former Glorious and Heroick Fears of Arms, the recital of which I shall omit to avoid prolixity, besides that I suppole I have heretofore fufficiently discoursed of his Warlick Incounters, Victories and Prowels, to make him admired of all men. At present therefore it will not be amps to let you see that the Diety and love clattering of Weapons did not banish this Magnanimous Prince from the professing of Piety, and the love of Learning. And as for his Piety, he could not chuse but bear a great affection to Christianism, being descended from a Father, who had the honour to be the first King of France that bore the Title of Most Christian King. For the proof whereof I shall urge the Voyage which he made into Isaly, to repulse Differ King of the Lombards, who was leagued against the Pope; And (in the year seven hundred seventy four) in a full Council of one hundred and thirty Prelates, caused the Priviledges to be given of choosing the Pope, to the Archbishops and Bishops of the

And in reference hereunto I might also alledge the Liberalities towards the Church of Rome, by confirming the Donations which Pepin his Father had granted the Chusch, besides those which he himself did give unto the See of Rome, and the making over of the Deputiship of Ravenna, which from thence forward he would have depend of the Popes obeyfance; As also the Donation (as some say) which was by him made to the Church of the Island of Corfica, and all the Continent of Liguria, from the old ruines of the Town of Luna, to the very Alpes. And however all these are very excellent and remarkable Actions; yet they seem not unto me to have been the chiefest testimonies of his Piety; wherefore I shall only set down three others, which the good different may justifie his Integrity and Holy life; The first is the good order and discipline which was obcipline observ- ferved in his House, for you could not perceive in the Court of so great a Prince, the usuall excesses and Courtly dissolutions, and loosnesses which were wont to be present in other Courts, For in lieu of Fools, Naturals, and fuch like Gulls, whereof the most part of great men do make use (as Jesters) to recreate their ears, during their repasts, with some pleasant tales and stories;

this Emperour had always a person who did read unto him, either the holy Scriptures, Histories, What difand chiefly the Books of St. Augustine of the City of God; all which were so pleasing unto him, course the Entas that he was never fatisfied with feeing, reading, and hearing of them. A fit pattern for all peror was en-Princes, who desire to attain unto the highest pitch of Honour and Felicity, whereunto they should tertained withconform themselves, and drive away from their presence those bablers and pratters, who for the all at his remost part poylonthe Courts of Princes and Monarchs with Cruelties, Lubricities, Vice, Corruptions, and all kind of other villanies. The fecond example concerneth the Charity which he performed towards the poor, which was fo great, as that he fent great films of Money as far as Charity to the

Egypt, Frusalem, Africk and Syria, to be distributed amongst the poor Christians, who lived in poor. Captivity under the Sarracens. In France and Germany he founded several Hospitals, and left Legacies in Money, which he devoted to the nourishing and maintenance of the poor; He had always twelve poor men in his Train, who lived at his cost and charges; but after that King Aygoland did reproach him that they were not fo well entertained as his fervants, they were more honourably treated. Thirdly, We shall represent his Magnificence towards the Churches, which would take The Emperors up too much time to repeat particularly : To the Churches of Mayence, Strafbourg, Cullen, Trier, Liberality toand others, as well in Germany as in France, he granted large Priviledges, and endowed them with wards the vast Revenues: In Germany he built several Cathedral Churches, as well as in France, their num-Churches.

bers being infinite; all which might be fufficient to Eternize this Princes memory, who the better to Four Univer-Immortalize his Name, erected four famous Universities, the one at Padua in the year seven hun-fities erected dred ninety one; after he had chased Differ out of Lombardy: I know some would attribute the institution there o Frederick the 2d, but they are grofly miftaken. He fent unto Pavie in the year 10r. feven hundred ninety two, John Maitres the Scot, who was the Companion of John Duns, and of Alcuin (the Emperors Tutor) who was one of those two Friers who cryed through the streets of Paris. That they had knowledge to fell, and demanded but meat and cloth for it. He gave unto him the Abby of St. Anfin hard by Pavie, that there he might begin to plant the first Stock of Learning : and there he ended his days. As to the University of Boulognie, some doalso endeavour to bereave him of the honour of the Institution of it, to confer it on the Emperour Theodosius, but they are far to feek on that particular : And it is void of all doubt that he was the first Founder of the University at Paris, at the folicitation of his Tutor Alcuin: I deny not but Sciences were taught in this great City, but they were expounded by fome fo grofly and ignorantly. as that it was rather a dishonour than a commendation to good Learning; and by this means he prepared the way for his Successors to perfect so happy an undertaking. Nor shall I stop here to enlarge on the praises of this most famous University, I intend to be as brief as possibly I can in this Discourse. Our Emperor was none of those great undertakers, who talk much, but when The Education it comes to the point (as it is truly faid) withdraw their hand and do nothing. He thought it no of the Empedishonour to cause his daughter to learn to sow, and to be exercised in the art of good House- rorschildren.

wifry; And his fons were instructed in all the profitable Sciences and Liberal Arts: But now adays forfooth, we meet with fome Buffoons, who are willing to dispence with Princes in the troubling of themselves with knowledg and the Contemplative Sciences; because, say they, it would crack their brains, but I pray, Where are these mens brains? and was there ever a more active man The Emperor than our Emperor? who notwithftanding was very fludious, well spoken and Eloquent. So like- very much wife was Peter Pifa his Tutor for the Grammar, and Alcuin the Englishman for the other Sciences, addicted to by whom he was instructed in the Rhetorical, Dialectical, and Aftrological Arts: He began a His Master: Vulgar Teutonick Grammar, and he corrected many vitious Barbarisms and corruptions which The Books he were crept into it; inferting in it the most memorable and praise-worthy Acts of the Ancient Kings, made. and Valiant Captains, and caused his Subjects to learn it. And for the better Governing of the Commonwealth he stablished excellent Laws and Ordinances, which were reduced into four Books, by Anfegism Abbot of Lobe, and afterwards Archbishop of Sens. So likewise was he minded to have altered the ancient Laws and Customs of the French, but fearing least such a change might breed The Emperor have aftered the ancient Laws and Curtonis of the French, but taking was the data actually bleed minded to al-a Sedition and Mutiny, he quitted that defign, and did nothing therein. But it was he, (as Paulis ter the Laws of Amilius and Guaguinus do write) who first instituted the Twelve Peers in France, in the year of our France, Lord, eight hundred and twelve, viz. three Dukes, the Archbishop of Rheins, the Bishop of Laon, The Emperor Lora, eight humarea and twelve, which the Counts, or Earls, the Bishop of Chaalons, of Noyon, and of inflitutes and the Bishop of Langras; three Counts, or Earls, the Bishop of Chaalons, of Noyon, and of twelve Peers Beauvais. The other fix were fecular ones, viz. the Dukes of Burgundy, of Normandy, and of France. Guyenne, and the Counts or Earls of Flanders, Thouloufe, and Champaigne. However there have been great alterations as to these Peers, and it is a question whether or no they were instituted by the faid Emperor, as I have observed in my Geographicall description. And the more I enter upon this faid Discourse, the more matter I do ftill find therein with so much superabundancy, as that should I fet down all the particulars, I could fill up whole Tomes, without the reciting of feveral things which were done and undertaken by this our faid Emperor, who (as we are made to believe by the Author of the feven Worthies) had been at Ferusalem , which is contrary unto the Truth for A militake a-Author of the leven Wortmes) had been at jerminem, which is contary and the retail, to bout the Emthere is no mention at all made of him, in the Catalogue of the Christian Princes, who were in the peror Charle upon two particulars: First, That he was very Ambitions: and secondly, That the year wherein he obtained the Empire, (as also the year wherein he died,) many horrible and prodigious figns moon of the control o upon the Em- stained this our Valiant and Puissant Emperors deserved praise. And for to prove his said Ambittion, the faid Writers do usually forestall two of his Actions; the first was, his Enterprise (not to make a wooden bridge, which he cauled to be built at the City of Mayence over the Rhyne) but to have a new River cut to pass and fail from the Rhyne, into the Danube : True it is, that this design was a very confiderable one; but there is very little reason that thence any one should frame an Argument to the disparagement of our said Emperor; to the contrary he ought to be praised, for having purchafed the greatest commodity that ever could have happened to Navigation, and for the benefit of his The Eagle with Subjects. And of as little value is that other afperfion laid on him, That in the year eight hundred two heads ti- and two, he did begin to take the Eagle with two heads for the Crest-Coat of the Imperial Arms whence these controllers would needs infer that hedid it through the Presumption, Arrogancy and the Ambition he had to bring the two Empires under the Eagles talonts : But in one word I can infifie him against these Calumnies, viz. by the imitation of his other succeeding Emperors, who all of them to this very day, have governed and commanded under the felf fame banners, thereby to flew that the Eagle ought to Govern and Rule both the Eastern and Western Churches. And the better to filence these Impostures, I shall only alledge the Agreement which Charle Main made in the year aspired to both eight hundred and two, with the Ambassadors which were sent from Nicephorus Emperor of Greece, by which they promifed, not to attempt any thing upon each other; and confented that both of them should be called Augustus. For which cause Charle Main would never attempt any thing against the States of Greece: And if his Ambition had been fo great as the envious persons have published it, besides the means which the Prince of Zara had discovered unto him) had he not a very fair pretence to have undertaken the fame, by reason of the War which Hirene the Emperor Constantines Mother had somented against her Allies? And moreover had he been willing to have taken this said Empress to Wife, (who had fent him an affurance thereof in the year eight hundred and two) could be not have made himself Master of both Empires, without the tying himself to the agreement which he had made with Nicephorus? Thus much to the first aspersion: And as to the Prodigies and wonderfull signs which happened at his attaining unto the Imperial dignity; I do not believe that any folid and perfect judgement can be given thereon, unless a man had a particular Revelation from above, declaring the fecrets and meanings of those figns, and to what purpose God permitted them to be seen. Con-cerning those which happened at his death, I shall let the discrett and judicious Reader judge of them, fince they are no Articles of our Faith: For as it is pretended, Turpin the Archbilhop of Rheims, being at Vienne, many Devils appeared unto him as he was reading his Pfalter, which faid Devils he conjured and commanded to tell him whither they were a going, whereunto they answered, that they were unto Aquifgrane in Germany, there to affilf at the Emperor Chair Main's death; which Turjin having heard, withed them in their return to call upon him again; and before he had ended the reading of his faid Pfalter the Devils returned back very fad, whom he asking what fucces they had had, the Devils replied, that the Emperor according unto his deferts was theirs, but that there was a Frenchman without a head (meaning St. Dennis) who had flung fo much timber and flone in the scales, that the vices and enormities which they had proposed were too light: This story is told by Nicolus Giles, and written by Tur; in and others, which hath given occasion to those who are not much inclined to believe in the Merits of the Saints, to mil-doubt those things which are written concerning them and their Miracles. But and if these stories were true, shall any one therefore blame Charle Main? I think truly they may, in the fame manner as a man might blame William L'Allemand the 2d Count of Mascon, who if we believe Peter the Abbot of Cluny (in the 2d book of his Epistles) was said to have been carried away by the Devil, because he usurped the Church Lands, and Clergies goods; although as I have read in credible Authors, he was murdered as he came from his Countrey house at St. Sorlins, amongst the rocks of Solutre, by some of those who were in dispute with him for the Tythes of Priffe, the domains of Davaye, Chivignes, and St. Sorlin, which were worth 2000 Crowns yearly revenue; and this forged ftory of theirs they endeavour to make good by an apparition which a little after was feen in the Town of Mafcon, and which was faid to have been the Count of Mafion. Therefore as you fee all the aforefaid cavils, wherewithall malitious persons have endeavoured to traduce this Magnanimous Emperor Charle Main, being subject to caution are also sounded on bare surmisals and forged stories. I may lawfully maintain, That he was not without reason termed Charle Main, or Charles the Great, having by his Valour, Justice, Prudence, and Dexterity, caused the Crown of France to ascend to such a high pitch of Honour: having attained to that grandure that no French King could ever before compals: unto which he was conducted by the affiftance of his Father Pepin, and by the acuteness of his Grandfather Martel. And having found the ground-plot laid by his Ancestors; it was easie for him by the agility of his Wit and Industry, to scrue himself up to such a degree of power, as he became dreadfull to all Europe. Moreover having reftored and fettled the Pope in his Chair, he brought back the Empire from the East to the west; which for so long a space of time had been transported thence; and preserved himself in a peaceable and quiet possession of the Kingdom of France, Gascony, Brittaine, Italy, Germany, Hungary, Bohemia, Sclavonia, Bavaria, Saxony, Dacta, Prifa, Liburnia, Istria, Dalmatia, and the greatest, and best part of Spain. Finally, after several Victories and Conquests which were by him obtained, he was seised by a pleuristical Feaver, which carried him into the other world, on the eighth day of January, in the year of our Lord eight hundred and fourteen, the seventy and one year of his Age, the fourty fixth of his Kingdom, and the thirteenth of his Imperial Reign : He was buried at Aquigrane in Germany , and upon the lower plate of his Tomb. together with his Pourtraiture, this Epitaph is written, viz.

SUB HOC CONDITORIO SITUM EST CORPUS CAROLI MAGNI, ATQUE ORTHO: DOXI IMPERATORII. QUI REGNUM FRANCORUM NOBILITER AMPLIAVIT His Epitaph ET PER ANNOS XLVI. FOELICITER TENUIT. DECESSIT SEPTUAGENARIUS ANNO DOMINI DCCCXIV. INDICTIONE VII. QUINTO CALEND. FEBR.

Englished thus,

Under this Tomb lieth the Body of Charles the Great and Catholick Emperour, who most Valiantly augmented the Kingdom of France, and most happily ruled it for the space of fourty and seven years. He died in the feventy and one year of his Age, in the year of our Lord eight hundred and fourteen, the leventh Indiction, on the fifth Calends of February.

He had five Wives, the first named Galcena Daughter of the King of Galistria, by whom he had Chate Mains no Children: the second Herming and a Daughter of Disser King of Lombardy (or that Kings Sifter Wives and named Theodora, as some Authors will have it) whom in disdain of Carolo Mans his Brothers Widow. Children. and of King Differ, he repudiated; or for other reasons best known to himself. The third was Hiltebranda Daughter of the Duke of Suevia, her he loved very well, and had by her three Sons and three Daughters, viz. Charles, Pepin King of Italy and Duke of Bavaria, and Lewis, firnamed, Debonnaire, or the Courteous, King of Aquitane, whom he made his Affociate in the Empire. His three Daughters were named, Rothrada whom Constantin would have married; the second Bertha, and the third Gifelia, who would never be married. His fourth Wife he took in Germany, and she was called Fastrada; and his last was also a German Lady called Luithgranda, of the Suevian race. by whom he had not any Children at all ; After whose death, he was acquainted with other Ladies, by whom he had several Bastards, and amongst the rest one named Pepin, whom he shut up into a Abastard son by whom he had feveral Battards, and amongst the retr one manned repm, whom he had feveral Battards, and amongst the retr one manned repm, whom he had confpired against him. And amongst many others, one vertue was highly confoires according to the conformation of the retrieval commended in this Emperor, he was very good Natured, Temperate, Gentle, and flow in taking regainst him. venge against any who had done him an injury; as he witnessed, when through his window he saw at midnight Eginardus carried upon the back of his eldest Daughter, whom he only chid in the presence An example of of his other Lords: And truly I suppose but few men would have acquitted him at so cheap a rate; but Chaile Mains it feems it was the Emperors meeknels and benignity, wherein, as in all other vertues, he surpassed all meeknels and those of his Age, &c.

THE LIFE OF

TAMBERLAIN, Emperor of the Tartars.

Anno Mund 5365.

Ann. Dom. 1398.

Hether we confider the commencements, which gave life to the Soveraign Enpire of this same surious raging Tamberlain; or whether we delight our selves by observing the means whereby he scrued himself up unto the summit of Clory. We must needs confess (although we were never so void of reason and judgement) that it is scarce possible, less credible, that so despicable a vessel should contain fo great a stock of admirable Actions, and that thence a branch should have fprung, which did subvert the Turkish Menarchy, and several other Potentates, as the sequel of this present discourse will manifest. As to his off-spring, Historiographers do much vary about the truth of it. Some fay he came from the midst of the Par-origine where. thiant, a people very much redoubted in the Romans times, though but slenderly samous. Others

fay he was a Turk, a Scythian, a Zagatean, a Tartarian, because it is apparent he was born at Samercand which is adjacent unto the River Taxartes hard by the Country of Zagatas. And as there is some difference concerning the place of his off-spring; so we shall meet with a far greater concerning his qualities and extraction. Some deriving his descent from Cinges Cham, and make him to be the Son of Zain Cham, the third Emperor, who usually is called Bachti. Others suppose him to have been but an inconsiderate person, of a base extraction, but who afterwards caused himself to be reputed to be the greatest and most powerful Prince of all the East, in so high a degree, as that appellation of him to Hannibal taking is for avanced that he call, in lo high a degree, as that him to Hannibal taking is for avanced that he can him to Hannibal taking is for avanced that the can him to Hannibal taking is for avanced that the can him to Hannibal taking is for avanced that the can him to Hannibal taking is for avanced that the can him to Hannibal taking is for avanced that the can him to Hannibal taking is for avanced that the can him to Hannibal taking is for avanced that the can him to Hannibal taking is for avanced that the can him to Hannibal taking is for avanced that the call What Tambers and felf-willed man, then this fame Tamberlain; and that none ever punished thefts and plunders Lain was, as to in such a manner as he did, although himself was the greatest thief and robber, and the most detestablest villain (as to his Altions) which ever any History did set forth or could produce. And on the contrary, he was again to excellent a personage (as to his Intellects) that by his audacity and asfurance, he facilitated those things which all others judged to be impossible. Moreover he was so highly befriended by Fortune, that he never attempted any thing, but he came off with credit: Nor did he ever wage War, but he remained Conqueror. However some do scruple the meannels of his birth, not judging it possible that so inconsiderable a man, as he is said to have been, should attain to fuch a pitch of greatness, as to shake the Turkish Empire which was so long a fettling. But fince I find, that the generality is of that opinion, It will not be unbefeeming my joyning with them therein; and to fay that he was the Son of one called Sangali, a man who was none of the wealthieft in the world, infomuch as that Tamberlain was conftrained (in relation to his Fathers profession) to keep Cattle and Herdsin the Fields, but he had not long followed that vocation, whenas entring in- Tanberlain to a certain Treaty and League with the reft of the shepherds of that Country, they chose him to be from a Sheptheir King, and did inroll and lift themselves under his command. Finally, some others do conceive herd becomes him to have been a poor fouldier, but a subtile and circumspect man; who wanted no wit, being of a King. a lively and quick spirit. To which they add, that being got up on the top of a Stable wall, whence he had a mind to have froln some horses, and perceiving that the owner had discovered him, he flung himself down the wall, and in the fall hurt his thigh, by reason whereof he ever since remained lame. However he performed gallant Actions; and he was mightily praifed for the equity, policy, and good discipline wherewith he maintained his Army. So that had he not a little too much flackned the reigns of his Cruelty and Ambition, he doubtlefs had excelled all the Warriers that ever Tamberlain were in the world; for no Chieft ain had ever attained to the practical part of ranging and disciplin-ranged and ing an Army, fo exquisitely as he did. And should I relate the several good orders which he caused disciplined his his fouldiery to observe, it would be an endless work . And if any one was found out of his rank, or gadding abroad out of his Quarters, he died without mercy; fo that there was no shelter or falety for spies. I shall omit the several manners of repartitions of his Quarters, and under what penalties he caused his Military orders to be observed, fince the Reader may be better satisfied therein by feveral other Pens who have most amply written concerning this famous Captains deeds and shall proceed more particularly to describe his life. Now by his robbings and thieveries he had so well thrived on all fides, that at laft, he was not a little troubled, how to preferve that which he had thus unjustly acquired. And therefore he took two Puissant men among the Massagethians to be his Assortain's ciates, viz., Chaidaren and Mirxem, who being gained by the prefents which he gave them, came un- Affociates. to his relief with their Forces, and with this support, he fell upon the Tartars, overcame them and Tamberlain defeated their Cavalry, which gained him fuch a repute, as that the inhabitants of Samercand furnished defeats the him with Gold and Silver, and Forces to go through with his undertakings. So likewife the King of Tanters. the Massagethians made Tamberlain Generall of all his Forces to his own ruine, for at the taking of General of the Pogdatma City in Tartary, Tamberlain (on purpose to usurp his Kingdom) did cause a Fig to be Massagerans. given him, and after his death married his widow. And immediately after made himself King of Samercand, and of the Massagets. Harbouring a defign at that very time to conquer the Empire of As whereunto he was much sollicited and edged on by Chaidarss, who brought Myrxess in difference with Tamberlain, to whom he had reported some words which Myrxess had too freely and unexaced and his advisedly fooken of Tamberlain, whilst he was only General of the Massages, which cost Myrxem death. his life. Afterwards he began a War against the Hircanians and Caducians whom he conquered. And The Hircanibecaule the Arabians did ravage the neighbouring parts, and gave relief unto the Caducians; he thereupon took an occasion to invade all the Nations which were subject to the Sultan of Persia, of Baldistance Damatic and of Egypte However though the could not conquer them after he had well noise

Nor did he therefore spare the Assyrians, Persians and Medes, who had given the Arabians relief, but plundred all their Countrey, took some Cities, and quite ruined all the lower parts of the Countrey. And as foon as he had feetled all things there and was fure of them, he faced about towards the lower parts of Syria to conquer it; and affailed the City of Damas, where he made a Tanberlain pitiful dehuge of blood, and a terrible havock of the wealth which was in that City, being the chief of Wars in Syria, all the East for the Levant in traffick with our Europians. And being not faished with that booty, takes Doma he marched towards Alep which Town furrendted it self, being unwilling to incur this cruel Champions dipleafure, of whom it is reported, that in his affaulting of places the first day he fet up a white Banner or Ensign, signifying that if the besieged did surrender themselves that day, they should have their lives and goods preserved. The second day, he caused a red one to be displayed, his pleasure then being, that in case they yielded that day, the Masters and chiefest of the families Ensigns at the should onely be put to death to fave the rest. great number of the Turks.

But whilst he was busied in this manner, tormenting some, and undermining others, flattering himself with the vain hopes of the great Conquest he should make, he was called home again by the troubles which were arisen in his own Country. For the great King of Catay, who is one of the nine Indian Hordes , and the Soveraign of all the Tartars, had made a pretty The King of Casty warsup- fpoil through all Tamberlains, Countrey, who in the beginning thought to have thundred him on Tamberlain. Out again, but finding with whom he had to deal, apprehending leaft if he should exasperate the great Cham of Cattai too much, it might endanger his possessions, was con-frained to come to a Treaty, and to demand a Peace, which was granted him, conditionally that Tamberlain (hould do him homage, and should pay a yearly Tribute for the Maffagetes Countrey which he held. Nor need we to doubt but that Tamberlain, might have withstood the great Tartar, but that he was loath to diminish his Forces, with which he was resolved to with the King wage War against the Ottoman Family; being spurred on thereunto by the great Ambition he had always to undertake some considerable expedition or other against his Neighbours. Wherefore being entred Cappadocia, he besieged the City of Sebasta, and fought against it with so much dexterity, as that the Turks being discouraged, and having lost all hopes of being re-lieved, had not the heart to defend themselves against the Scythians, Persians, and Baltrians, who having taken the Town put all to the sword whom they found in the place, so that it is faid there died that day , above fixfcore thousand souls , besides some persons of quality, which were taken, and amongst the rest the Son of Bajazes the first of that Name, who by Bajagets Son his Father had been put in the City of Sebasta, the better to provide for the defence of it; taken in Seba- but he had not long kept it, before Tamberlain made him pals under the merciles cruelty fla, and put to of his most impious rage. After which he sent Ambassadors unto Bajazet, commanding him to render unto all those whom he had dispossessed, whatsoever he most unjustly detained from them (which was but a meer pretence in Tamberlain to pick a quarrel with Bajazet) as alfo to pay unto him vast and excessive Tributes. Nor will I here venter to contest whether war upon Ba- Tamberlain had just cause to War against Bajazet, as being a Tyrant; for all the world knows this Tartar, made use onely of this cloak or pretence the better to colour and disguise his defign to out this poor Turk, who on his part was nothing inferior to Tamberlain; who Arrogantitiles although he was called Tamis Cuthla, which in the Tartarian Language fignifies a Fortunate appropriated Iron; because he was not onely happy in his enterprises, but as valiant as his Sword; insoto Tamberlain much as that he made a great part of the world tremble. So on the other part Bajazer was firnamed Lelapa, which fignifies a Furious Wave, and Hildin, which fignifies Boisterous and Impetuous. Notwithstanding Tamberlain did make him know, that his Fortunate fword, did not apprehend the being shaken or broken by the Turkish Waves and Thunderbolts; but that to the contrary his name Lelapa was rather to be stiled a whirle Wind, not by reason of Bajazets Agreat defect vertues and valour, but because of his passion and hastiness, whereby those fortunate enterprises were diffipated and confounded, which he might have carried on gloriously, had he suffered reafon to have been his guide. And it even fell out fo, for Bajazet returned a very smart anfwer unto Tamberlain, and unadvifedly tainted the Tartars Wives honour; which words cost Tamberlainex- him dear. For as Tamberlain did not bear any good will to Bajazet at all; fo his Wife being enraged at the indignities which were put upon her by the Turk, did so highly incense her Husband, as that he was not to expect any peace with his Wife, unless he pursued the Turk

Wherefore Tamberlain affembled a formidable Army of Tartarians, Scythians, Persians, Armenians, and Battrians, amounting unto the number of eight hundred thousand fighting men, and passed through the Provinces of Lydia and Phrigia, which caused Bajazet to raise the siege of Constantinople, and to march unto Afia; to hinder the Messageran from coming into his Countrey, refolving before Tamberlain should have time to proceed he would encounter him, and fight him in Armenia, or upon the banks of Euphrates, and although they fought each other, yet they could not meet a long while. Bejazets Council in the interim were of opinion that he should do well to treat with Tamberlain, seeing he was not strong enough to resist him, and would not dispend his Treasury to raise new Forces. After which the Turk having intelligence that Tamberlain marched in Bithinia , to besiege Pruse (heretofore Bruse) the chief City of the Countrey and the Royal Seat, he resolved to fight him in that place. And both Armies joyned battle on the Mount Seella (where Pompey fought with Mithridates in the year one fights Bajager, thousand three hundred ninty and seven) and the Turk chancing to be worsted, there were above two hundred thousand of them slain in the place, and an infinite number taken. Now Bajazer perceiving that the day was loft, began to acknowledge his error, when it was too late, wherefore he resolved to repair the faults the best he could, and save himself by slight, being mounted on a Mare; which was as swift as the wind. But the misfortune of his difafter following him; he was pursued by the Tamberlanists, who overtook him, by the fault which Bajazer committed in letting his Mare drink, who thereby became so heavy and replenished, as that she could not make so much way as she did before; besides all which this poor King was troubled with the Gout, which had disabled his hands and his feet. The Tamberlanists having feifed on for ch a booty, as also on all the Basha's, Beglerbyes, Agaz, and Sangaes of the King of Turky; he was brought unto Tamberlain, who taking him by the shoulders said these words, Thou dilloyal Coward thou art now my Slave, and had receive the reward of thy deferts. Bajazet being full of amazement, answered him, I pray you Sir, kill me, but the Conqueror replied, Lets go, lets go, there is no man can fave thee. When as this milerable captive forgetting the milerable effate Bajagets indifwherein he was, returned harfh language unto his conquerer, and with injurious terms began to inveigh cretion in rewherein he was, remaining upon thing him with his bale extraction, and with his former profession of thievery. So that it was a wonder this Zagathean did not cause him immediately to be slain; for on a less occaffon he caused his great friend Mirxe to be put to death, because he only had adventured to say, that the principality of Samercand was too well fettled, to fall into the hands of fo inferiour a fellow, and fo inconsiderate a robber as Tamberlain was; although these words were not spoken in his presence, nor after he had attained to that dignity. But it feems he referved the venting of his choller upon Bajazet, because he would not put him to death before he had observed all the formalities of justice. And truly the Captive King had little reason to rail at him, for immediately he caused him to be set upon a Mule, and in a way of derifion to be led through all the enemies Camp, and afterwards caused him to be tyed The dignities in Golden Chains, and to be put in a Cage, carrying him up and down with him wherefoever he went, and mileries of and when he got upon horfeback, he caufed him to kneel down, fetting his feet upon his neck and Bajart. shoulders, making him his footstool (as formerly Sophorus the King of the Persians did unto Valerinus the Emperor of Rome) and fed him only with crums of bread and broken morfels which he flung unto him just as if he had been a dog. However Bajazets courage could not hereby be abashed, as it appear- The Sultaness ed when Tamberlain caused that Sultaness which the Turk loved best (and who was taken with the Bajagets wife Kings children and all Bajazees Concubines in the Seraglio of Pruje or Bruje) and made her ferve him ferveth Tomat table. At which fight, the miferable captive flew out into howlings and roarings, reproaching the bettain at table Conquerors baseness and pride, in making so little esteem of the Kingly race, for this Lady was the daughter of Eleazor King of Servia. Moreover these conquests so pussed up this Tartars heart, as being not able to contain himself within any compass, he had designed to pass into Europe to conquer it, Temberlains but his death put a period to all his ambitious enterprifes, in the year of our Lord fourteen hundred and defigns to three. He was the most Ambitious man that ever was heard of, and who would by no means be ren- Conquer Eudred civil nor familiar. Whereof a certain Genna Gentleman, who was one of his great favourites can rope prevented give a testimony, and who essaying to break him of his rudeness and inhumanity wherewithall he treated those which he had overcome, he answered him, How now thou Dog? dost thou think I am a Man? Tamberlains I am the arath of God, and the ruine of mankind; nor have scarce any exceeded him in cruelty. Two scarce of himexamples whereof I shall set before you: The first was when he caused that most barbarous inhumanity self. to be exercised at Damas on the maidens and young children, who came out of the faid City to meet the inhumane cruelty of Imhim, clad in white, and bearing Olive branches in their hands for a token of peace and submission; this bertain unworthy and cruel Tyrant fet his Cavalry to Maffacre and trample underfoot all that flower of youth, and taking the City, he put all the inhabitants thereof to the fword. The fecond was the impiety which he committed against the Spittle of Lepers which was joyning unto the City of Sebasta; where by reato prejudice the Tartar; and whereby they might have promised themselves a privilege of security, implets against to prejudice the Tartar; and whereby they might have promised themselves a privilege of security, implets against the privilege of the privilege of security. yet he caused them to be inhumanely Massacred, alledging, That they infested the Air. But for all this Lepers. I must not tob him of that honour which he acquired for his strict observance of Justice, even against Tamberlain a his own fouldiers, who as foon as they were taken in any offence, were most severely punished, which great observer we may observe by the sentence which he caused to be inflicted upon one of his Captains, who walking of justice.

and perfidious Tartar, and desiring him to do her justice; he returned hera most Kingly and gracious answer, that he would most severely punish him, and so he did, for as the Tartarian Histories relate, he caused him to be impaled or spitted on a stake alive. Finally least the Reader might be mistaken, and might conceive, that in my description of this Tartarian Emperors life, I was ignorant that he was called by another name befides Tamberlain. I would therefore defire him to take notice, that I have called him to; To follow the general denomination of him in this manner, that to all men might Tumberlains know, who it was of whom we do write these praises. The meaning of breaking Priscians head

Mongst all the Ancient and Modern Writers, both Greeians, Latins, French, and others, there is scarce any one who hath with so much industry, facility, and certainty, prescribed the precepts of well and congruous speaking, as this Prisian, who hath gained such a Prerogative above all the reft of the Grammarians, that all the faults committed against the constructions of the Syntax, or which do favour of a Barbarism or blemish in the Art of well speaking, and accurate writing, are imputed to so many injuries done unto Priscian, as if the property of well speaking, and excellent writing, did of right belong solely unso him; and that he was guilty of high Treason against Priscian, who had failed in those prescriptions which were

by him dictated for the Grammatical confiructions, and for which he was to make him an amends. Moreover to the end that all men may the better comprehend what a kind of preheminence I intend to allow himabove the reft of the Grammarians, I will make a comparison (although I desire not that between falle any confequences should be deducted thence) between fuch as break Prifcians head, and those who counterfeit their Princes coin; for these by falle doins (which are not warranted, and against the Laws) do make such money as is neither allowable, nor valuable, and so commit a double crime, aswell by their attempting to usurp the Royal priviledge of their Prince, as by the exposing to the publike such mony as will not pals. And therefore such men may be said to break their Princes head, that is, to usurp his authority, and (by a difdain and misprission of their Princes) to deceive and cheat their subjects. In the like manner those do break Prifeians head, who having not the capacity, and being not verift in the Art of well speaking, will however venture to tattle, and instead of uttering near and quaint speeches, do produce nought but despicable, ridiculous, and forged patcht up stuff, under falle coin; and being not fo well verft or flored as to pick out the quaintest allay or expressions, do publish the most impertinent, unplea ngest ill couched pieces, as ever came to light, having no regard at allumto Prissians authority. And truly be might very well have filenced such kind of presenders to learning until they had attained to a higher degree of perfection in the Art of well speaking and excellent penning. But they on the Contrary by their overmuch presumption have even enforced their way, and emancipated themselves so far, as to obtrude most abortive discourses, which are so obvious to the shallowest brains, as that without the bringing of them to the touchstone of wir, It may be easily discovered that they were not forged in Priscians Study, but coined in some fordid Kutchin-stuff-tub. But I shall quit this unfavoury discourse, relying upon the general consent of all Judicious and Learned perfons : That this our Prifcian is deservedly reputed to have been the Prime Chieftain of all the Gran- Prifcian the marians. And therefore the King of Persia, did most highly efteen him, by reason of his singular Prince of the and furpaffing knowledge, which he fufficiently evidenced by feveral books which he composed upon Grammarians, the Grammar, having not left the least parcel of it unrefined. Befides which, he was an excellent | hi- The King of holopher, which we may differ n by his books of his Natural questions, and those he wrote on the Art Perfus effect of Cosmography. As to the place of Priscians birth, divers have strangely mistaken themselves, in saving that he Priscians birth. was born at Cafarea, although feveral grave and credible Authors do teftifie that he was born at Rome: and amongst the rest, Babtispa Guarinus of Verona hath most elegantly proved it. That which caused the militake was, because Priscian intitles himself of Cafarea, and whereby some believed that Cafarea The reston was the place of his birth; but it was for another reason he was called a Cafarean, viz. because he had why Priscion perfected most of his Studies at Cafarea, and had gained a marvellous reputation in that place; info- was called a much that he rather chose to be called by the name of the place where he had studied, then by the name Cafarean although be was of his Native Countrey. But that we should thence infer that he was more covetous and ambitious of honour then he deferved, truly I cannot well aver; for that I am of a contrary opinion, and that he cannot be fufficiently praifed for his not having been ungratefull unto the City, which had given him a diffinction from the ignorant animals, although the faid City was far inferiour indeed unto Rome (which at that time was the chief City of the whole world) and this Cafarea was but a mean Town of Palestin built by Herodes, whereof Enselow was Bishop. And at this Casarea, what day the faid Town is called Balbee and Belme, as I have declared in my Cosmography. Moreover the and where, Supputation of the time wherein this Prifesan lived, is much different; for Trithemise the Abbot faith, A different that he did flourish in the year of our Lord fix hundred and twenty; and by the denumberment of the fupputation of Roman Consuls, we find that he lived long before, because that he dedicated his chief book to Jalian the time wherein Prifthe Conful and Roman Patrician (who afterwards is faid to have been Emperor) in the year of our cital lived: Lord three hundred threescore and fix. But Raphall Volateran, in his Anthropology, differs yet more, for he faith, that Prifeian was in repute and did flourish in the City of Athens in Greece during the Emperor Justinians reign, and that he there composed several Books, and amongst the rest his Latin and Greek Grammar; which is it were true, Priscian must have lived long after, seeing that Justinian the elder (who fucceeded Justin the first his Uncle) reigned in the year, five hundred twenty and eight: and Justinian the second son of Constantine, reigned in the year fix hundred fourscore and seven. Mean while that which is most certainly apparent, is, that Priferan lived much about Saint Jeroms time who Priferan lived (as the Abbot Trithemius fays) deceased in the year of our Lord four hundred twenty and two, on the much about last day of the moneth of September being of the Age of ninety and nine years old. So that we must Saint Ferons conclude Volaterans calculation to have been erroneous, as also Jaques Bergamos, who transports Saint Jeroms life, unto the year four hundred twenty and nine; in which time he will needs have him to have flourished, which according to the former calculation would have been seven years after his death. And that which troubles me most of all, is, that Volateran doth confess that Priscian did very Priscian once a much affect Christianity, but afterwards he also faith, that he had gathered out of certain Authors, that Christian, but afterwardshe recanted. But by reason it is not specified wherein he failed, and in which points of Do- afterwardssupafterwardshe recanted. But by realon it is not specified wherein he raised, and in which points of 100boted to have the rine he was not refolved; moreover unless there be more proofs then those which are extant in his less than the writings, for my part I cannot thence infer any suspicion of Herefies in him. Unto this our Priscian Faith. the Translating of Dionylius Africansu his book (concerning the fituation of the world) is attributed, although the Grammarian Phemius Philamore did it, which faid work was after put into Latin Verses The translatiby Simon Lemnius. This work is very much praised by all good Authors, because (as Pliny tells us) on of Dionysius by Samen Lemnus. a burial, ing of their Funerals.

Mo Owever some may have despited the burying of the dead, yet it hath always been had in an extraordinary recommendation amongst the ancient; which the Holy Writ it felf doth manifest unto us, in the time of Joachim Son of Josias the King of Ifrael, whom God threatned by his Prophet Jeremy, Chap. 22. that he should be buried in the Sepulchre of an Ass, That is to say, that his body should be cast upon the earth without any Sepulchre at all. Cicero likewise in his Oration which he made for Milo doth very much blame Clodim, because he was not honoured with the Funeral rights which were in use at that true, wiz, with the reprefentation of Images, mournful ditties, publick thews, lamentations, hymns, veries and orations appropriated unto the praifes of the deceafed party. And truly the Romans fo much Ancient Cerehonoured Interments, as they accounted it a great infamy and different to be deprived of it, and even appointed it as a punishment to some notorious criminals, as unto murderers; such as had deferted their parents in necessity; and other offenders, contained at large in their Funeral infitutions. And A difgrace abecause several Nations have used sundry sorts of ceremonies at the burying of their dead, we will mong the Robriefly fet down some of them. The Romans did sometimes use to bury their dead bodies, and put them in the Graves before they burned them , onely erecting earthen Sepulchres made of great clods the Roman at over them, infleed of Marble monuments, which cultom lafted for a long while amongst them. But the folemair finding at length that they could not easily draw forth of the earth the bodies, or bones of fuch as had been long buried, they then began to burn the faid bodies, and to reduce them to Afhes; which having affembled, they preferved them in certain veffels called Urne; which they caused sometimes to be made very richly and coffly; like unto those wherein the Emperor Severus his Afhes were preferred, which were of Gold enchafed with coffly Pearls. I my felf have feen fuch like vessels which were made of earth, and fome of Glass, as in Greece, in Egypt, in Italy, and in France, about the Provinces of Bourdeaux; but especially in the Ille of Zant belonging to the Signiory of Venice (and not unto the Turk as Munster tays) where the Athesof the great Orator Cicero were preserved, (as I have ons in the bu- already described in my Cosnography) and thus much may suffice concerning the Romans Funerals. Other Nations who were lefs civilized, had likewife their particular wayes and manner of burying their dead. The Lothophagians did caft them into the Sea, inflead of burying them. The Hircanians exposed them unto Dogs and Birds to be devoured, which creatures they purposely kept. The Tiberians hanged fuch upon Gibbets as became very old. The Messages and Troglodies (a people of Ethiopia who have but one eye as Pliny writes, though I believe it not) did eat their dead themselves, giving this reason. That it was better they should eat them, then the Worms. The Scythians did Interrethole with their dead, who were best beloved of them in their life time. And the Egyptians and Syrians (observing a greater humanity to the dead) did as much as in them lay strive to hinder their dead bodies from rottennels and putrefaction, shutting them up in certain small Chefts, after they had well Enbalmed them with Myrrh and Aloes, the juice of Cedar, strewing Salt within, and several other Aromatical Drugs and Scents. But leaving this discourse, let us proceed to our intended purpose; and dilate on the particular of this most excellent Queen Artunifia, whose Pourtraichure I do berewish present you, in the faid manner as it is express in an Antick Meddal which I do keep in my Cabinet, not much dif-

Artemifia therefore was the Wife of Manfolus King of Cacania called Caria, and of old Halicar-whole wife. nelles, a rude barbarous Country, of little or no efteem, before it was inhabited by the Grecians, and whence the Proverb Iprang, In care periculum: There's danger in Caria: which faid Artemifia, Artemifia buby reason of the extream Love which she bore unto her husband; after his death caused his body to rieth her husbeburnt; and conceiving with her felf, that the could not find a more commodious place to bury him band in her in, then her own body; she caused his Ashes to be preserved in a rich Orne of Gold, and daily amongst her Wine, drank a certain quantity of them; mourning all therest of her life time for her Maulolus his deceased husband, and thus you see what an admirable Funeral obsequie she prepared for him. But sepulcher built not contenting her felf therewith neither, the cauled fuch a Tomb to be built for him, as never was by Artemifia. heard of before, and the which she called by her Husbands name Manfoleum, which faid Tomb was accounted one of the feven wonders of the world; being built in a square form, containing seventy foot in length, four hundred and eleven foot in circumference, and eight cubits in height. And to foot in length, four hundred and eleven root in circumstetic, and eight cubis in degit. This cause it to be the more exquisitely finished, the sent for the four rarest Architects of all Greece and the rare Architects of all Greece and tills imploved Alia, viz. Sapas from the Isle of Mileta, who built the East fide of it : Bryaz the Silaegon Eunuch in the buildwho built the Northfide of it, Timetheut the Phrygian who built the Southfide of it, and Leocares ing of the the Lavian who built the Westernside; and although Areams a chanced to due before it was quite si. Mansieum. nished, to the full perfection of it; yet however the faid Artificers did not give over the work untill they had quite finished it; and it is worthy to be observed, that four thousand men labored in it daily. The number they had quite finished it; and it is wormy to be observed, that not insulated then hadded a rice of workness.

Moreover the faid Queen, to render her Husbands Funerals more famous, caused, and ordained a prife of which labored which labored plate and of other precious Germans to be given to him who should in a most elegant manner set forth in the Mayle, her Husbands praises in a Funeral Oration; which is a rare demonstration of a Womans love and liberality towards her deceased Husband, manifesting that it ended not in her death, but that she desired to have it live to all posterities that should succeed her. And so it did, for this unparalleld ftructure of Queen Artemifias Funerall Monument, for her deceased Husband, gave a name to all the Tombes which were ever after erected for Emperors, Kings, Princes, and Potentates; and the which have ever fince (as Profortius Writes) been called Manfolas: and moreover thus much we may read in Martial concerning Artemifias praise on that account, viz.

> The Maufolean Tomb , which feems To raife it felf unto the Skie. Thy praises (Artemilia) deems , To eccho forth eternally.

Which serving as a president to Posterity, was imitated by some others, whose same will never dye, and that we may not be taxed to have passed them under silence. Behold, Porcia the daughter of Tallies whom and that we may not be taxed to have paned them under ment. belong you and take the could not be could not be follow him , swallowed down hot burning Coals. In likemanner Agria the daughter of King Adra- feparated from fin, and thewife of Polianim, the fon of Edipin King of Thebes , hearing that her Husband was their husbands flain in a Salley which he made against the enemies who belieged the City, got her self out of the place, by death it self and without the least apprehension of the adversaries cruelty, or the fierceness of savage beasts, she went unto the place where the battel was fought, and fought for her husbands body in the dark of the night, which having found amongst the dead, she brought it back with her into the City and caufing it to be burnt, after she had bedewed it with a torrent of tears, she put the Ashes into a Golden Vafe, and at every new Moon drank a certain quantity of them; vowing at the fame time a perpetual Chastity, which she observed all the days of her life, and thereby did imitate Artemis as glorious resolution. But if by these superstitious actions Artemisia rendred her self commendable : How much more ought we to admire her for her gallant conduct in the managing of a war? For having been confirmed to defift a little from those moans which she daily poured forth (in imitation of Antenigas of the languishing Turnel Dove, after her mates death) and for a while to quit her dismall lamenting against the life, to resist an Army of the Robations, which invaded her Territories, the therefore assembled her Robations, Forces , and marched towards them to prevent their further proceedings , defeated them two feveral times, and gained their Island. In testimony whereof a Statue was erected to her honour in the City of Rhodes, hard by the place where formerly the Colofus ftood : And had she been the first of her Sex who had given this proof of her Prowels, her Heroical magnanimity might have been doubted of. But fince there have been several famous Ladies who have far exceeded the strength and vallour of women, I may promife my felf that a greater belief will be given to this foregoing recitall which I have made. And for example fake, I shall onely alledge one, viz. Semiramie the Queen of the Assyrians, and exploits of who being entred upon the possession of so great a Monarchy as that which was afterwards held to be the first of the whole world under the Banner of a poor dismall and rejected Dove , did subdue all Ethiopia, with flood Stanrobales King of the Indies, who (although its feldom known that the Dovedares conset with the Hawk) she overcame not onely in words but in deeds, as Dion the Historian relates , who tells us, that the faid Queen Semiramie (having understood that the Indian King flighting her Feminine frailty thought to have out-dared her with high language) not being able to brook his ifolence, fent him this meffage, The effetts of a combat, are deeds , not words Staurobales ; and in effect the fought and vanquished him. So likewise that which Justin relates of her, is very considerable, and worthy to be had in remembrance, viz. That news being brought her that the inhabitants of Ba-blos (a City, by her felf reflored and built up again) were in a high Mutiny, and tending towards a fedition; although she was a dressing of her head when she received the news; yet however she got up and on horse-back with her hair hanging about her ears, and being accompanied onely with those which were about her, she took the field and rulning into the midst of the mutinous rable, she behaved her felf to discreetly and prudently, as that the appealed the sedition, and settled the inhabitants of Babylon in their accustomed obedience and loyalty. For testimony of which noble and heroick attempt of hers, and high resolution (not to lose so much time as to stay and put up her hair) there was a Statue erected in Babylon representing her just in the same posture as she was when she accomplished so memorable an exploit. But to return again to our Artemisia the Dowager Queen, she having laid by her Widows habit upon force (the days of her mourning also being expired) was constrained for the good and suture defence of her Countrey, to re-assume the Robes and Regal Ornaments belonging unto her; which the was perswaded to do, not without a great deal of reluctancy. But finding that States affairs were too burdenfome for her dejected spirit, she disposed of the Government of her Kingdom, unto those of her Council, whom she best trusted; and because her very Palace grew diffastiul unto her, by reason of the non consociety of her dead Lord and King, she chose to abandon it and her very Country to boot. Wherefore having given sufficient orders for the compleating of her Husbands Monument, she resolved to engage in some Foraign adventures. And ir fo fell out, that at the fametime Xerxes the great Persian Monarch (ambitiously aiming to reduce

Semiramic. Queen of Af-

all Greece under his subjection) raised an innumerable Army by Land, and an invincible Navy by Sea, with whom Artemifia fiding against the Grecians (her Husbands ancient Foes) rigged and manned as emperour Xerrar against out three Ships of her own, of which she was Archi Talasa, or high Admiral; and so putting her the Greefant. felf under the Persian Emperours protection, she joyned his Fleet, and behaved her felf so valiantly in a bloody Sea-fight which happened between the Perfians and Grecians, as that her Ships (particularly known by their Flags and Enligns) were observed more to endamage the Greeians Fleet, both in an offensive and defensive way, then all the Perfam Fleet besides; and although the Perfams had the missoriume to be vanquisht in that Sea expedition (though far excelling in number) yet Queen Artemisia, with hers, narrowly escaped and got in safely to Pholerum; although she was closely pursued by Aminim Palenam an Athenian Commander, who not being able to come up, or cope with her, relinquish the pursuit of her, and onely contented himself to fend better failed vessels after her, and to send ten thousand Draghnes upon her life, deeming it an high indignity, that a woman should affront the whole Athenian Navy, and afterwards make her way through them all. And Xerxes himself, as Herodotsus in his Urania reports, beholding how bravely above all his Fleet Artemifia and her Ships behaved themselves, and how couragiously they forced their way when all his Navy was in a manner quite deseated, ferching a deep ligh, he faid, Viri quidem extiterant mihi femina, femina autem viri. My men this day have flood me in no bester flead then women, and the women onely have behaved themfelves like men. And thus much we thought good to note concerning this most eternally glorious and

Mixt learning hath feemed fo ftrange to fome that they have dared to fay it was not onely mis becoming a man to addict himself to feveral kinds of difficult of them, and do little regard the complaint of that no lefs grave Philospher them excellent Physician, who complained of nature, That to life of man was Mans life but then excellent Physician, who complained of nature, That to life of man was Mans life but the man was the same of how which the first Arman. in flow she did not a state of the state of

Science, the life of two or three men, though four times prolonged) would fcarce fuffice. But to exclude some lively wits, and to conclude that an active spirit cannot persorm that which many others could not do without a great difficulty, would be altogether void of reason, and would confine the One Man may capacity of all humane industry, within the levell of some few mens weaknesses; and although this beverst in fe-Axiom may be verified both by reason and arguments, yet because it would require a longer time, veral Sciences, Axiom may be vermed country teams and arguments, yet could be subject to uncertainties. I have rather chosen to propound one Person who will give us a affored proof of the Paradox which I maintain (that is to say) That a man may be very well worst

And this our Varre was born in the Province of Martonois in France, a man fo generally verit in the knowledge of most Sciences, as that it is a hard matter to believe what I propose, viz. That there are very sew Arts upon which he hath not lest some observations in Writing of his excellent Learning: Moreover the Catalogue of the Books he composed (which was learnedly collected by Gefnerss) will give a fufficient Testimony to what I say, and will clearly manifeft, that there are few points, either in Divinity or the Liberal Sciences, which he hath nor plainly illustrated, according to the time wherein he lived; And was for this reason much honoured by S. Angustin in his fixt Book of the City of God, where he thus faith concerning Varro, parto praised Who is there that with more curiofity hath dived into those things which have been surmized con- by St Austra. cerning the Godhead? Who hath found them out more Learnedly? or who hath more feriously considered them? who hath diffinguished them more subtilly? who hath written more diligently and largely thereon then he? Abounding in learned fentences, and though his language be not very pleasant, yet those who delight to learn according to the Rules of Discipline may the better profit by him: which manner of writing is by us called a Scholasticall and difficult way of Penning, but the other a free and liberal manner of writing, like unto the flyle of Cicero, which was pleafing to thole who read it. In which fewline for the mo-whom I would remit all those who are fo curtous as to furnish their fibraries: As for humane and lideller of a Liber al Sciences, that man cannot be found, who according to the times hath written more to the purpose on them than houself. There is, that at periods who have notall his Books, so that houself is that it found is that a period who have notall his Books, so that houself is framing a Library onely of his Books, would be a neer Chimtera: And yet I would not counted any one to perule any other Books fave those written by this excellent Philosopher Varro; and might I be credited, I should advise all those that design to ered Libraries, to found them on the pattern and model which we have from the Magazin of Varro; who fets up the Mathematicks in an eminent and honourable place; the Mineralists, and fearchers of hidden fecrets in the bowels of the earth, may from his abounding Treasure draw forth the myftical vertue of their Divine undertaking. As for the Historians, and Ansiquaries, it cannot be denied but Varro hath laid them a foundation, having traced the fuccession of Times, Ages, and Families: He hath likewise made an Essay upon Husbandry, which is fo well digested, as that it may easily be seen (by those sew Books which are yet extant, and have been preserved from the malice of the times,) that he was a perfect experienced man. Last of all, the Grammar, Phile (ophy, Peerry, and the other liberal Arts, have received a marvellous luftre from his Labours, which by the calamity and envy of the times had bin abused, discoloured, and for the most part detormed, had not the diligence of Joseph de L' Escala (a person endued with eminent parts , and perfect in the knowledge of fublime matters) of Peter Viltor a Florentine (whose memory ought to be cherisht and reverenced by all those who affect either knowledge or vertue) and of Anthony Augustin a Spani.rd, who by his most elegant amendments hath so much reformed our Varro (as also many other Authors) and who hath written very exquititely upon the Civil and Common Law, and other excel-lent perions by whom the rich, and diverly flouritht Lineaments of Varro are replaced in that pericction we now by their endeavours found them. I could at prefent make an extract of his Sentences, but because it would be too long, I shall content my self to remember two onely: The first is touching the duties belonging to friendship, which are expressed to the life, not as they ought to be prescribed and ordered by the just precepts of Friendship, but as they are now practifed, Rich mens friends (faith he) fland by the Barn to gather up the Gorn: Evidencing that friendship is fo corrupted, as that men meafure it now onely by the Ell of profit and accountage, which hath been very much observed by Cicere, Aristotle, and others, as well Philosophers as Poets. The other is concerning the command and power great Persons have over their servants, and slaves, under which Notion many have oftentimes taken a liberry to exercise most execrable cruelties and inhumanities. It is well known that the sentence of these poor Creatures was drawn in that fair Parchment, which notably imported, That all persons who are reduced to a fervile condition are dead. As it is evident by many passages, as well in the Ticle of the Rules of the Law, as in other parts of the Body Civil, and easie to boobleved by the Reader , but they did not well confider, that by the Law of Natio s, which gave them their original , this ought to be underftood of the civil d. ath, and not of the naturall. Foralmuch as Arifforle hath very well observed in fome part of his Books, concerning the Civil Government; That there are flaves which have their understandings more free and generous than those that are qualified with the Title of Liberty ? so that this effentiall form which endued them with reason, could not be taken from them. As for the life which is common to bruit Beafts, it could not be denied that they I kewife did not enjoy the finge benefits for to whatfoever pain, labour, or fervile subjection they were pur, yet are they fometimes more lively merry , and better disposed then those which do eriumph under the Clock of Liberty.

The diffincti-

Although then the diffinction of Free men from flaves, be not by reason of Nature, yet nevertheless the foolish Mafters mistook the civil death for the natural, and handled their slaves as they do Clay, freeman and a Stones, and other manimate things, and made no confrience at all to put these poor creatures to death. 14 : O I know that the Emperours by their Edicts have moderated , (as much as in them lay) fo great a rigour, and Varroalfo hath endeavoured to remedy the fame. And upon that occasion held wisely this opinion , That flaves ought not to be forced and compelled to their duties by stripes , menaces; and Wounds, but to be drawn to do their duty by mild and plea ant words, kind and humane Actions; i h.

In the Christian world, that cruel and wicked Tyranny of flavery hath for the most part been rejected and cut off; neither were the exsortions, cruelties and barbarismes of other people, altogether, and in all places alike horrible, who though exalted to a higher degree of power and command, would not, or else could not by their superiority, destroy at an instant, all those who were inseriour unto them. I shall always remit them to this grave Confull, who by reason of his rare and excellent vertues was called to the Diffator flip by the Romans, but would not except of it; though he were very much courted thercunto. I know full well that fome attribute this refufall to fome prefage which he had drawn upon the Romans at the lamentable and almost utter defeat of all the Romans in the Battell of Cannes. But be it how it will, certainly he was a man that did not begin any thing at the wrong end; neither was it possible that a man , having past through all the Degrees of Honour and preferment in the Roman State; and who at laft being offered the highest Dignity of all; should be stupid or shallow brained. The long age he lived, having attained to fourfcore and ten years, makes me beleeve it was malice onely that afterwards imputed to him the dilaster which happened at Conners: However I was willing to let you fee his Pontraiture, to as I caufed it to be drawn after an Ancient Medall, which I brought out of Italy, together with those of Ovid and Salas 1100000 any Kingdom, State or Empire in the world hath been turned to and fro like a weather Cock, with divers changes of Governments, it is that of Persia, which was first of all usurped by Alexander the Great, who Divers chanspoiled Darius of a Monarchy he had held by the space of fix years, ges in the Porand turned topfie turvy the state thereof in the year of the world three thousand thirty five, in the hundred and twelfth Olympiade, and fince Cyrus usurped it from the Medes, two hundred twenty and eight years: And after it had been under the flavery of the Macedonians, for the space of two hundred ninety three years, as well as of the Arlandes or cut-throats, and murtherers, the space of five hundred and fourty years, and under the Disciples of Mahomet and the Tartars a very long time : The Sophi seized this fair and spacious Kingdom in the year of our Lord one thousand four hundred seventy and eight, as Chronologerstell us, who have described to us the extraordinary Courage and Valour of Affamb, y, or Uluncalan Grandfather of Hismael, in memory of whom we write this present History. He had usumcassan and by Despinacaton Daughter of Carlo-jan Emperour of Trepizond, one Son and three Daughters; his children, The eldest was married to Secaidar Father of this Sopby, who waged a grievous War against Rustan and Alument his Son, but was forced to yeeld to his missfortune, and was slain in a totall Rost of his Army at Derbent, his head cut off and given to be devoured by Dogs; So great and secalitars miimplacable was the hatred of the Persians towards the Sophies, that where-ever any of them was ferable end. found, it was impossible to fave his life. The occasion of the hatred was this, Secardar had depo- Secaidars and fed those from the Government, who seemed to have descended in a right line from frent; to Himsels right that indeed there are some by whom this Sophy hath been evil spoken of, accounting him a Seducer, and to the Kingto have got the Scepter by fecret and undue practifes: but they confidered not that those who com- dom of Persia. manded in person after Julaver, were illegitimate, and enjoyed the Kingdom without any just Title. And that it is fo, Bayfingir was the Adulteress that conspired with Patirsa the Wife of Facub, Daughtter of the Lord of Sammura, to poylon her Husband and Son, with whom the died likewife. As for Ruft an there was no right to prefer him to the Kingdom before Secaidar, but onely in cafe the Race of the Ulumcassans thould fail; for he was not called to the Persian Crown, as Son in I aw to that great Affembeg or Osumcaffan, who after the death of Tamberlain, (which happened in the year one thousand four hundred and three) delivered the Persians from the Tyranny of the Tariars. And if Secaidar were much opposed and entangled in his affairs, his Son Hismaelhad no better fortune, for as foon as the first news of his Fathers being murthered founded in his ears, he and his two Brothers, whose lives were envied, and likewise sought, fled away hastily to save themfelves, the one into Natolia, another to Aleppo, and the third, which was our Hismael, to the Island of Arminig, scituate in the lake of Vasthan, or Gelucalat, and having taken resuge there, he found an unexpected good reception, by the means of a certain Priest of Armenia, who pretended to Judicial Aftrology, beholding earneftly his face and Phisiognomy, found so great hopes of his excellent graces and perfections clearly appearing by the lineaments of his face and body, that he took all the pains and care he could to bring bim up. And befides the Prefage of the Conftellations, there was hopes that the Kingdom of Perfia would defeend to him, if he could be kept fafe from the purfuits of Amelut; and that being advanced to the Crown, he hoped he would not be ungratefull, but would advance, cherish and honour him; and hereupon he kept him privately, for fear it should be discovered where he was, and endeavoured to instruct him in the Christian Religion; but this young discovered where he was, and encaroured to intruct min time contributions outlins young Prince being put up with Ambition, little regarded any Religion at all, accounting no otherwise of it, than according to the advantage he received thereby, to compat his defired ends; which was the cause he could not long endure to live with his Master, although he gave him great respect, and for his sake showed much favour, kindness, and friendship to the Christians, when he came to his Crown, which he obtained not without a great deal of difficulty. After he had taken his leave of this Priest, he retires to Chilan, and lives with a Goldsmith, much devoted to his fathers family, and by his dexterity, underhand made his friends, understand secretly living at Ardovil, how earnest his desires were to recover his Liberty, whom he so well allured, that with a common consent they refolved to revenge the Defeat which they received at Derbent, and the Massacre likewise of Secaidar, unto whom they bore a great affection, because they held him to be their Prophet, having withdrawn himself in a manner from the Mahumetanism; nor would he suffer the Alcoran otherwise to be allowed of, fave according to the interpretation of Haly, fon in law, and Coufin to Mahomet, who had fet up a new Faction amongst the Sectaries of that damnable Doctrine of Mahometanifm. And for this reason Secaidar was by Belle Forrest erroneously compared unto the chief of the Reformed Religion, because they receive not the Word of God, save according to their own interpretations, rejecting those of the Catholick Apostolick Roman Church, in like manner as the Sopins did concerning the Aleoran; which Conclusion, were it a proper one, we must either confeis the Aleoran to be good, or beleeve that there is some correspondence or sympathy in it which may make it sympathize with the purity of the Gospel. But peradventure the good man did not prie so narrowly into the matter, as he ought to have done, but onely as to the quality, and not regarding the consequence thereof, he would needs spend his verdict on these Reformations. But the truth is Secaidar, by his having changed some particular points in the Mahometan Religion, did thereby in such a manner gain the hearts and affections of the Sophies, that he became Lord and Master of the Kingdom of Persia; and his son Hismael remained King, notwithstanding Alumnt used his utmost endeavours to keep the possession of the Kingdom, which he pretended descended to him by just right from his Father Kustan.

Hismacls first exploit which was his ma-

by Hi∫muel.

The first gallant exploit which Hi/mael did, was upon the Castle of Maumutaga, which he possesfed himself of, by surprisall. Now the place being impregnable, by reason of the scituation of it, and the great Treasures found in the Village under the Castle, eclypsed greatly the designs of his Enemy, who durst not send an Army to besiege it, being sure to lose his labour, and therefore would have the world to believe it was a Policy in him, to have this bone fall on purpose into Hismaels hands, thinking that being a young man, he would continue gnawing upon that, and not have attempted any further upon his Estate: But reckoning without his Host, he found that he was mistaken, for Hifmael, with the Treasure he found, drew unto him people from all parts, levied men, and made up an Army, and managed his affairs fo well, that in a thort space he was followed with five or fix thousand Sophians; whereas at the taking of Manmutaga, he could hardly muster two hun-Sumachia taken dred. With these Forces he advanced to Sumachia, a great and Capitall City of the Kingdom, and the fiege having not lasted long, Sermangoli the King thereof, finding himself too weak to refist the Forces of the Sephians, refolved to retire to the Castle of Culiffan, and abandon the City to the mercy of Hismael, who took it, and with the spoils thereof made large Presents to all those of his Army, whereby he did not onely captivate and affure their hearts to him, but the fame thereof spreading abroad, caused new and fresh Troops to resort to him daily, which highly displeased Alumnt, who was well affured, that so soon as the Sophy should gather strength enough, he would fall upon him; And therefore he affembled his Forces together, and Hismael did the like, sending to Alexanderby, Gargurambey, and Mirzambey, Kings of Iberia, to defire aid from them, who upon his promites fent each of them three thouland Horse, and about fix thousand Iberian Foot, all Valiant and ftout Souldiers, with the which, and those Forces he had with him, he marched and became Master of the Field; whereat Alamut who was but a young man, (not above fixteen years old,) was much perplext, hearing of the great preparation which his enemy made. Whereupon he came to Tauru, and from thence marched towards Sumachia, between which two Towns the two Armies met in a posture to engage in battell , but the great River standing as a Barricado between Alumus defeat them, hindred their defign for some days; till at last the Sophy had found out a Foord, and by edby Hismacl night, whilst the enemy lay secure, charged Alumns so furiously, that the Sophy had out off the most part of his men before they were well rouzed out of their sleep, and Alumnt himself had likewife fallen by the Sword, had he not in all haste faved himself in Tauris, which was also taken by the Sophy about four days after: who knew not, as he ought, how to gather the fruits of his Victory, but abandoned himself to all kinds of cruelties, manifesting his nature was bent to all kind of inhumanities, not at all favouring of the mild and fweet disposition of a Persian. I will not mention the fearch he made for the bodies of Jacub and other Nobles who fell in that memorable Battel of Derbest , in regard (that I may speak like a Courtier) a natural instinct drove him on to revenge the injuries done to his Father, which may in some measure excuse the errors which he committed by furpassing the bounds of discretion. But his causing of women great with child to be The great cruript up and opened, and the fruit of their wombs to be plucked out, was not onely an inhumane; but math. a most unnatural action. So likewise after the taking of Tauris, he caused three hundred common Strumpets to be beheaded, a good sport indeed for Nobles, though it's onely pleasing to those who use it. Nor know I how to alledge as a proof of his inhumanity, his causing four hundred of King Alamuts followers to be kil'd, because it may be objected. That the evil affection he bore to the Master. might juftly provoke revenge upon the fervants: neither ought I to place in the first rank the cruelty he shewed in commanding all the Dogs in Tauris to be killed, though it were a manifest token of his brutish severity, some in Egypt having drawn the hatred of the people upon them, for exercising fuch like cruelties upon bruit beafts. But this man spared not his own Mother, commanding her to Hismael case be beheaded in the City of Tauris, because he had a suspicion that Sacaidar was treacherously sold, seth his own and more miferably murthered by her procurement, at that fatall and unhappy encounter at Derbent, mother to be in regard the had married a great Noble man who was prefent at the overthrow : Whence this put to death. wretched unnaturall Son took an impression against a good Mother, that because she had married a man who affifted at the afaffination of his Father, the must needs have had a delign to defraud her own children of the fuccession in the Persian Monarchy, which descended to her, as being the daughter of Uslumcasan (as you have already heard) and settle the Kingdom on her Husband. This kind of excessive cruelty which he used, seemed to have listed him up to the highest degree of his glory, and caused those to pluck in their horns, that had lifted up their Heads against him, of whom the most part were constrained to come and do him homage, to stoop (though with great regret) to his commands, and to receive the Casebas or red Turbans the Ensign of the Sophies. But there was one that declared himself an open Enemy to him, which was Muratcan the Sultan of Bega- Hismatlgains a deth, who contended with him for the Kingdom, pretending to be right heir to Usumcassan, and victory against Musican Sul-

capable of fuccession. When it came to a fight, there was a great Defeat, and the Victory fell to Hismael, who being detha not yet twenty years old, gave so great and solemn an overthrow near Tanris (about fourscore and four years since) that of thirty thousand fighting men which were in the Sultan of Babylons Army, there hardly escaped one.

And yet he was not so fast seated in his Dominions but that some nails were always wrong driven. which I do not alledge in regard of the Province of Durbeth, having always been under the Kings of Perlia, was now disjoynted from it, for the Sultan Calib, Lord of Afanchif came to present his humble service to the Sophy, received the Turbant, and offered to be his loyall and faithfull subject Sultant Calib and fervant, which pleased Hismael so well; that he confirmed him in his Government, and gave Sophies fifter. him his fafter to wife; But that familiarity and friendship was of no long durance, the faid Sulsan thewing himself disobedient in some things to the Sophy, he took an occasion thereupon to displace him (though he were his Brother in Law) and advanced Ustagialn Maumuthey to the superintendency of the Cities of Afanchif and Amida, who was lately come from Natolia to prefent his service Ustagialu Mana to the Sophy, and receive the Turbant, and became so acceptable to Hismail, that he married his mutbey marris other fifter, whereby he was no great gainer; fuch marriages ferving onely to divide great persons, second fifter, which was his delign, Sophy knowing very well that those that were newly raised to honours. and were strangers, could not suddenly to strengthen their wings, as to be in a condition to fly above his reach. After he had thus dispersed the strength of those which were in a capacity to oppose him, he raifed a powerfull Army against the Alidulians, whom Ustagiala could not overcome; defiring the Turk, and the Egyptians, not to intermeddle in this business, in regard his design was no other than to recover his own Countries, which had been usurped, with promises to both not to encroach upon their Dominions any where. As foon as he had an affurance from these two Princes (in the year one thousand five hundred and ten) he fell so furiously upon the Alidulians, that had not the ex-Hismael wars ceffive cold countermined his Forces, without all doubt he had gained all their Countrey, however against the he won many Towns and fortified places, in which, with his own hands, being much inclined to cruel- Atidalians, ty, he committed incredible inhumanities. He beheaded with his own hands Becaibey the Son of Aliduli and Alimulus his Predeceffour, who was treacherously delivered up unto him by the Traitor Amirbey. He could not in honour abstain from renewing his quarrell with Muratean Sultan Hismael fals of Babylon, who had feized upon the great City of Siras, being the Metropolis of Persia, but this upon Muratean pursuit was without effect, for the Babilonian retreated with three thousand chosen men unto Alex, Sermandeli and coming to the River Euphrates, caused all the Bridges to be broken down, which was happy for King of Servan him, for that the Sophy had fent fix thouland refolute fighting men to cut him off in his retreat. Nor did it trouble Hismael much that Sermandoli King of Servan had broken the peace to which he reselbas and had fworn, fuch a petty Rebellion, giving him opportunity to overrun all his Countreys, and to usbee Cham of take all the Government from him: And he tamed him so well, that all the rest of the Lords and Tatary and perty Kings of that Countrey, strove which should come first to offer his service, and receive the deseated by Turbant. There remained nonebut the Tartars who pretended to give a stand to Hismaels growing Hismael. state. And hereupon Jefelbas Cham of Tartaria, and Ufbec began to invade the Territories of Co-rafim, where they got nothing; fave being taken in a Battell which they lost (in the year one thou-fand five hundred and twenty) were both by his command beheaded, yet would he not defraud their Children of their Dominions; But they not at all acknowledging the great favour and humanity shewed to them, when they were a little setled in their great Estates, fomented a Rebellion against Hismael; and moreover killed as many Sophies as came under their clutches, which gave him occafion to arm himself a new against the Jeselbas (so called, by reason of the green Tarbants they wear on their heads, but the Perstans wear them red, and the Turks white, (and charged them so furioully, that there remained not one man alive.

While he was busic in curbing these cowardly Tartarians, the Curdes who inhabit mount Bichi perswaded Sultan Selim to invade his Countrey, flattering themselves that it was impossible for the Sophy to escape out of the Tartars claws : But it fo fell out that the Turk got nothing but shame in that expedition; and had it not been for the valour of Sinamber Beflea, the Turks had undoubted-tained against ly loft all their Baggage and Artillery. I may here also make a recitall of the Victory this Sophy obtained against Solyman, who came with force enough to swallow up the Countrey, (in the year one thousand five hundred thirty and four) which he might easily have done, had he not met with one, who being not able to put on the Lions skin, covered himself as well as he could with that of the F_{ox} : To speak the truth, finding himself too weak, he retreated in fuch a manner, as he seemed always to provoke the Enemy to fight; but he would not engage in earnest, till he saw his opportunity to fight them, and rout him with small force: Finally he fo amused the Turk, that at last he drew him into a very narrow passage, then Historicaling divided his Army, and fent away threefcore thouland men, who about the middle of the night regained by affault the City of Tauris, (taken a little before by the Turk) who had left great Treasures and provisions in it. The other party charged the Turkish Army in the Rear with such resolution and fuccefs, as that they were forced to fly hastily away out of the Sophies Territories, in the year one thousand five hundred thirty four, with the loss of half the Army. And in the year one thoufand five hundred fourty and nine, he affifted the eldeft Son of Solyman, who perceiving his Father Historical affilts did shew more favour and affection to his younger son, shed into Persia, and fell upon his Fathers Territories upon the confines thereof: And although the Turk came with an Army of five hundred thousand men, yet could be gain nothing at all upon the Sophy, a great part of the Turks Army for & invades periffing by the Famine and the Sword, so that the Turk was at last forced to a retreat. The year his Territories, before he folded the Courtest of Courtest and before he subdued the Countrey of Corassan, which had withdrawn its obedience from him, and made configure-gained by Hif- a cruell flaughter of those that occasioned the revolt, enforcing those that survived to wear the Turbant:, and exercise the Religion of the Sophier. But why should I dwell upon the particulars of the Conquests and Victories of this great Sophy, fince there is hardly a Prince that hath been so succefsfull and happy in fo many Victories as he was, and for that reason his subjects accounted him among the gods, going to the War voluntarily, meerly out of pure affection to him, fighting with their breafts and Romachs quite naked, crying in these words Schiach, Schiach, which fignifies in the Persian Tongue, a god, a god. Whence some have attributed this name peculiarly to the Sophy, and in his Titles he is called Scheich Ismael: But others to qualifie the prefumption which might be attributed to the Sophy, fay that the word Scheech is never taken but for a Prother, and that the name of Sophy was indeed principally, but not exclusively derived to him, Soph) in the Arabian tongue fignifying well: But let the excuse be as it will, there was an excess of arrogance however, for he was no Propher neither, unles a Title appropriated to the Father can be derived to the Son by reafon of the first rife he gave to the fect of the Sophians. Some Authors have attributed his death to I know not what definy, which they appropriate to a certain wood called Servane, for my part I think his excellive eagerness and passion in the prosecution Hismael Sophi's of his enterprises brought that disease upon him, which cast him into his grave; to the great regret both of his friends and enemies.

The great Turk himself having notice of his death, expressed much forrow for it.

The end of the Life of Hismael Sophi.

THE LIFE OF EORGE (ASTRIOTT, called Scanderbeg Prince of Epire.

Anno Mundi 5433.

Ann. Dom. 1443.

LI those, that have written of this Captain, seem to me to have chosen this subject to lay open the treasure of their eloquence; so many praises do they publish of this Epirote, amongst which Marin Barlet, a Native of Scutary in Epire is one. And this hath not been done after the manner of some idle fantaftical writer or pratter, who stuffes a History or Discourse with eloquent and high expressions of desert and merit, whereas the object it self most commonly deserves not a single commendation. But Barlet and other historians knew not sufficiently to celebrate the renown of George Caffriot, in regard his Heroick and generous Actions had gained him fuch reputation, that he was not onely reverenced by his friends, but his very enemies had fuffi- Caffriot greatly cient cause to admire his valour and noble acts. The Turks themselves, whom he had often esteemed by conquered and vanquisht, notwithstanding the great evils and extraordinary losses, they sustain- the Turks. ed by him, could not forbear to extoll his ever undaunted valour and courage, wherewith they were fo much taken, that after his death (if we may believe Paulun Jovisu) having made themselves masters of almost all Epire, at last seifed upon his Sepulchre, at Alessio, which having found, they worshiped, and adored it very devoutly; at length these superstitious people pulling out his dead Bones, pillaged his Sepulchre with a flew of Religion, thinking themselves to be invincible, and safe in Battel, if at their going to fight they had but the least piece of a Relique of this invincible Captain, bung at their neck in Gold or Silver. But I suppose Paulus forim the Author of this story hath failed in this particular, because it was contrary to the Law, usage, and custom of the Alcoran, to suppose the Turks did worship the body of Scanderbeg, who no more then the Jews, Moors, Tartars, Ard-reprehended, bians, and other Mahumerans, will not receive their dead bodies into their Temples, and much less into their Cities : far greater reason should they therefore have to refuse to worship and reverence the Bones of Scanderles, (how great, valiant, and renowed a Captain foever) in fuch a fort, as Paulus Jouins Supposeth. Moreover they use no such Ceremonies to their Prophets Mahomet, Haly, Oclan and others whom it is most likely they would rather invoke to their aid in opposition to the Force of their enemies then the Reliques of Scandertegs body. But as Paulus Jovius (finding that our Caffreit deserved to be magnified and praised,) hath exceeded the bounds of reason and credit, and to extoll him, hath found out things too rediculous to be believed, and too light for the gravity required in a History of folighta nature. Befides it is directly contrary to the rule of the Alciran: however I will proceed to fet forth the Noble Acts and high deferts of this great Ep. ror according to the truth I find of them. He was fonto the Lord John Cellifor; Lord of Epine, formerly called Emathia : his mothers name was Voijavea, daughter of the Lord of the Pritullians or (as others will have it) of mothers name was rossavea, quagner of the Losu of the recumants of a somets will have it of Poland, which is part of Macidonia and Bulgaria; he had three brothers, Repairing, Stanissum, Confiantinum, live listers, Mari, Jula; Jula; Jing, Jing, Valica, and Mamsa, This laid Julin Castrino was valiant, couragious, and of an illustrious tamily, who possesses a great efface in the Country of Epire. His habitation was in a City called Croy; being the chief of his territories, allied to the ancient Kings of Macedonia and Grecian Emperors of Conflantinople. And as he far exceeded all his Predicefours in prudence gravity and magnanimity and an invincible courage; so his youngest son followed his steps, and foared somewhat higher in reputation : whose lively Pourtrainure I here represent, the fame, as it was procured by me at Bourble a City of Epire, and had fince lent it to Monsteur James de la Bardin , to enrich his History withall , which was printed at Paris in the year 1576, who confeffed that he had it coppied from my original; whose example I could have wished, they had followed, who disfigured, and counterfeited the Picture of Plutarch, which I lent them to be put into the Lives of that Author which they printed in the City of Paris, this prefent year 1583, they might Lives of that Author which they printed in the City of Fall's, the pretent year 1503, they might have confeded to have had that Plutarch from me, which they could not fo much difguife, but that it plainly appears, they drew the defign from that Effigies which they importuned me to lend them. This George C-first therefore did not at all degenerate from the excellent and rare vertues of fo noble a father, but rather, from his valiant and heroick exploits, he feems to have elevated the race of the Cafriors to its highest degree of honour and renown. And though 1 do not much value the Prodigits and observations, which many men as it were adore at some Nativisies, yet will I not conceal, what was prognofticated of the glory , that should accompany this famous person ; his mother dreaming , afwhich nappen and the was conceived, that the had brought forth a Serpent of that bigness, that it covered almost all Epire, and stretching out its head upon the Dominions of the Turk, it swallowed them up with its bloody throat, dipping his tail in the Sea, that looks towards the Christians, and especially towards bloody inroat, apping its tan in the sea, that now is some of the confines of Venice. I know many will be apt, to be encouraged upon this relation to flatter them the confines of Venice. I know many will be apt, to be encouraged upon this relation to flatter them the confines of Venice. honorable effects of the Venetian State. In a word, the experience and progress of his whole life do manifeftly verifie this supernatural Prophesis. From his Youth he applied himself so much to the Bow, with other military exercises, and acts of valour, that no Historian makes mention of his equal; neither could any famous Captain ever compare with him in Warlike exploier. It is supposed that upon this occasion the Turk; gave him the name of Scanderbeg, which fignifies in the Turkis language, Great Alexander; and to speak the truth, he was a true Alexander indeed, having conquered many Provinces, for the Tark, among others Mifia, forcing George Uncheriech the Despote into his City called New Mount, Metropolitane of that Country, where it is reported there are Mines of Gold and Silver. But the name of Scander big doth more juftly, belong to him from another title more eminent and honourable, which is, that being converted to Christianity, he behaved himself so resolutely in all his undertakings, that he became very formidable and a terror to the Tarke, remaining victorious in two and twenty Battels, which he fought against Amerath King of the Turks, and Mahomer the second his fon. In revenge whereof, their malice could reach no further, then to reproach him with ingratitude for his good usage they gave him whilft he was of their party, and called him an ungratefull fon, for not acknowledging the great benefits, and honour, whereunto he was advanced by them, yet were they nevertheless much engaged to Sent derbig, aswell for the great defeat which he gave the enemies of the Turk; in a pitch Battel, as for particular Duels , which he had fought in Andrinopolis against the Scithians, who had defied all the Court of Amerath; also in the City of Burfe (which is now the principal of all Afia) against two Virfians called fasa and Zampea. These tokens and tryals of his courage to captivated the hearts of the Turks, that to oblige him the more, and affure him to their party, there was no honour, which in reason could be bestowed upon a subject, but was liberally cast upon him. However after the death of that brave personage, John Caffriet, it was necessary for Ostoman to be more Prodigal in his bounty and munificence towards George Castriot, the more deeply to engage him to himfelf, and either to keep him from afpiring to the Kingdom of Efire, whereof he had made himfelf Mafter, and Poffesor, by fending thither a great Garrison under the conduct of Sebalic, fuddainly after the death of John his Father, or at leaft to keep him from feeking revenge for the death of his Brothers, who were treacheroully and fecretly made away by poilon foon after the death of their Father. But as this kind entertainment of the Turks, ferved onely to cloak and cover the double heart of those Insidels towards Scanderbeg, from whom they could not detain that Kingdom without incenfing him too highly. In like manner Seanderbeg was no less wary, and subtle to diffemble the defire he had to reposses that Kingdom, which this Tyrant had nurped; and to shake off the yoak of Alcoranifme, wherewith he was more entangled, then he defired, he made shew to be so well fatisfied with the \mathcal{T}_{wrk} , that above all others, he confided in the wildome and loyalty of this \mathcal{E}_{pirot} , who knew so well to temporise on this Account, as that being invited secretly by his subjects to recover with the Turk; his liberry, he fent them away without any certain hope, or appearance of any magnanimous or generous thoughts which might encourage them to recover that, which being juftly detained by Amurath, might be reftored to him again by the affiftance of his faid subjects. But having been too long under the servile yoak of Turcifme, waiting daily for a fit opportunity, he did march off much about the time of the battell which was fought between Hunniades General for the Hungarians, and the Turk (in the year Scanlerbeg re-1440.) whereby so great an advantage was given to the Christians, as that the Turkish Army was for the Turk the most part defeated. I shall omit to discourse here with how much care (by the Tarks order) this Cafrior was instructed in the most impious Religion of the Aleran by one Hogia (to wit)an old Philo-Sopher , which the Arabians call a Siaic ; but I will rather observe what a loss it was to the Turk to be forfaken by one on whom he had conferred the greatest honors and fairest estate , that any favorite of that Grand Scienier ever attained to; and had likewife been imployed as his Lieutenant as well against the Christians, as Pagan Kings and Princes, so that indeed besides the discomfiture of the Turks by Hunniades, by the retreat of Scanderbeg (which gave him the faid opportunity) the Turk found himfelf bereft of Epire, and had acquired an enemy, who being a man of great undertakings, and a high spirit, would not suffer him to be idle or without imployment : and as Amurath understood it very well, fo was he not deceived in his opinion, for Scanderbeg having taken the City of Croye by The City of means of his Nephew Amelius and some other friends, and having made a Law that all the Turks Croye obtained who still persisted in their savage and obstinate opinions of the Alcoran , should be put to the sword : by Scanderbeg. Being three and thirty years old he went to the City of Alleffia, where he made a League and Alliance with the Albanian Princes; which City was then under the Dominion of the Venetians, and in it was held a Diet of all the principall persons of the Countrey being assembled there at his request, and among others there was Panl, and Nicolas Ducaginus, Peter Spainus, Lech Dusmanius, Lech Zacharius, A Diet or Al-Aranith Conyno , afterwards father in law to Scanderbeg, Andr. w Thopia, and the magnificent Rectors fembly held at of the Venetian State. At which affembly, Scanderbeg made an eloquent speech above an hour in Alleffia, and length, which was very pleafing to all those which were present, who having highly praised the wife assistance given advise of this Prince, every one put himself in a posture to reach out a helping hand to restore him to Scanderbeg. to the possession and enjoyments of those Countries, Territories and Dominions which were unjustly detained from him by the Turk, And he on his part ceased not to be active every where, to befrege, force, and conftrain those, which endeavoured to continue their obedience to the Turk. One thing scanderbees very observable is confidently related of him, that from the very day he entered into Epire, until greatvigilancy; the perfect recovery of his Estate; he scarce ever took two hours sleep together at any time, so earneft was he to re-establish himself in that right which belonged to him : besides he was so well hardned to heat and cold, and all other inconveniences, that he regarded not the conftant travail, and continual watchings which of necessity he must daily endurg. It is reported by some Authors, that he was a great eater and a lufty drinker; and that he fought always with his Arms stripped, not fearing either cold or heat: But as he with all eagerness pursued his design of making himself Lord and Mafter of all Albania. Intelligence was fent him by a spie, he left at Andripolis with the Turk; that Alibeg Basha (accompanied with 60000 Janisaries, Archers, and Musquetiers, and 40000 horse advanced to marches a wards him) whereat he was not at all discouraged although at that time he was but newly declared King gainst Scanterof Albania, and his forces far inferior in number. But with great cheerfulness of heart, as if he already beg. held the victory affured, being followed onely by fifteen thousand Albanians, and twelve thousand other foot he bent his march towards that place, where he prefumed he might encounter the Turki, and made all possible diligence to advance his Army so near to that of Alibeg the Turkish General, that they might be necessitated to fight, and charged them with so great a fury and violence, as he soon put them to a milerable rout; every one wondered how in fo fhort a time fo great an execution could be made in regard the battle lasted but from Sun-rising untill the third hour. In this battle were Alibie Balba raken four and twenty colours, two thousand Turks were made prisoners, and two and twenty thoufand flain upon the place: of the Christians side a great number were wounded, and about a hun- Scialitibeg. dred found dead, Aliber General of the Turkift forces faved himself, and returned into the City of Andrinopolis, called by these barbarous people Hedrea Valdom, where Amerath was, who had well high caused him to be put to death, reproaching him that this Army was betrayed, as well as that wherein Castriot dealt falsly with him. To whom this poor old man with cries and sighs replied in these words, Vallahe et billahe benea, Verraim herniquisterce : which fignifies , O Sir! by the grace of Almighty God, I confess all that thou sayest for the present. As if he meant I have nourisht and brought up a man, who now takes up Arms against me, and torments my foul. But that which troubled this poor Turk most of all, was, that a peace being concluded between him and the King of Hungary for ten years (by the mediation and practife of George Despote of Servia and Rascia, which is the upper Missia, by the Turks called Segoria) and though respectively sworn to by them, upon the holy Evangeliffs, and the Alcoran, yet he much doubted it would not be of any long continuance, as in effect it was foon broken. And moreover he having newly received this rude overthrow; there came fuddain news that the King of Caramania or Cilicia, was preparing a strong and powerfull Army, therewith intending to invade the Turks of Natolia, called Great Turky, which perplexed him very much, being thereby necessitated to go into Afia with the Reliques of his routed forces to secure that Country. And on the other fide the Hungarian threatning the fame danger with the Caromanian and Albanian, it behoved him to look about him. And hereupon he thinks fit to fend an Ambassadour to Scanderbeg re-Scanderbeg presenting him rich gifts, endeavouring thereby to hinder the Albanians, who were as fules a true ver, but newly flesht at it were (with the Turkish blood) from advancing further, and from irrita- with Amurant ting the Octoman fury, desiring his friendship, and that he would abstain from all enterprises that

tended to his prejudice. Amuraths letter being read , dated from Andrinople the fifteenth of June, in the year of our Lord 1444. five days after Awadin the Turks Ambassadour was returned with an answer bearing date the twelfth of July of the same year, wherein Scanderbeg utterly refused the truce. which letter Airadin brought to the Turk as he was a hunting, and by word of mouth delivered to him all the rest of Castriors deliberations , wherewith this poor Infidel was so ill saissied , that he could not contain himself from crying out before his Bashaes, in this fort, Senica guna seythan konnar, as if he would say , I think Scanderbeg is possess by the divide, that his foliate regards my power and greatness. But Amurath being a man experienced in affairs, knew well enough in case he should feem to be discouraged, there needed nothing else to make the rest Cowards, and therefore to express his cheerfulnels, he smiled playing with his Beard, and spake again these words, Thou coverest, O unhappy, man! thou covereft sime memorable death, believe me thou halt have it ! we will affift, and without thy command will be prefint at the objequies of him who was nourifut by us, but now become our atter enemy, and will accompany thy funeral pomp to the grave for fear thou boaldest complain in hell, that thou camest northisber honourably enough. And however his countenance was compos'd, he had fad apprehenfions to himself aside, and thought on other matters, which occasioned him a long time to remain in a musing doubtful posture, and at laft understanding that Scanderbeg had disbanded many of his forces, keeping the field onely with some few light horfe, without any body of an Army, he fends for his Bafha Ferife, appointed nine thousand chosen horse encouraging them with large promises, in case they could conquer the Albanians : Ferife discharged his duty with all diligence, approaching secretly to the Frontiers of Macedonia. And though he marched towards the Albanians, more like a thief then a warrier; yet he came not before the news of his approach; Caffrior being advertised thereof by a spie who came to him from the Sultans Court, and so possessing himself of a Streight and narrow Valley called Micrea, the onely passage for the Turks . It ferved for a burying place for the most part of Frijes Army, who were fo inrivally charged by the Albanians, that he Bafba himself was forced to flye, leaving the best part of his forces either dead in the field, or Prisoners. Octoman finding himself so rudely dealt withall by the Multapha Balha Albanians, fends Muftapha his Bajha with five and twenty thousand men into Epire, exprelly charging him to be wary and not entangle himself in the Ambushes of the Albanians, but onely pillage and Caffrier into lay waste the Countrey, Scanderbeg advertised (by some horse be had sent forth to that purpose) of Epire, is defeate the spoile Mustapha made throughout all Epire, takes horse immediately, and being followed with three thousand horse onely, and tour thousand other good souldiers, led them as privately as he could between two vallies where the enemy was to pals, who affoon as they came near the place, separated and dispersed themselves into several companies, the Christians falling upon them in their disorder, soon made their way to the Turkes Trenches, infrantly gained them, and made fo great a slaughter that none escaped save onely a sew that followed the flying Mussapha, preserving their lives by the sharpnels of their Spurs. So Seabderbeg recovered not onely the Pillage they had taken from him in Epire, but also all the spoils of the Turks, who had no leiture to save their baggage, being so closely purfued by Scandarbig. But this overthrow did not discourage Amarath, who commanded Mushapha to raise new forces, forbidding him to spoil the enemies Country, or engage in a Battle with Castriot, but onely to hinder his advancing towards them, which fell out happily for this Christian Prince; for foon after he had a war with the State of Venice, by reason of the succession of Lech Zachary which shall be declared hereafter, because 1 intend not here to make a diversion and to omit the happy succels which Scanderbeg had against Mustapha the Basha, who seeing the Christians warring among themselves, very furiously; thought during their disorders, to fish in their troubled waters, and obrain the fruit of a victory, which he earnestly defired, and was very much hoped for by him, where-cond time by Scanderbeg.

Garrisons throughout all Epire. In the mean time the Great Turk transports all his Army into Europe by long marches, computed by some to be an hundred and fifty thousand fighting men (to wit) fourscore and ten thousand horse, and threefcore thousand foot, others reckon them but an hundred and twenty thousand in all, deducting twenty thousand horse, and ten thousand foot.

upon he so much importunes Amuraib, that he obtains order to begin a new war with the Chri-

fians, in which he was no great gainer, for Scanderbeg quitting Dadine charged that Pagan Army fo furiously, as that ten thousand of them fell upon the place, fourscore and two were made prisoners, and fifteen Standards taken , on the Albanian fide scarce three hundred men were loft. If this fignal victorymuch puft up the hearts of the Albanians; Amnraths (that plodding blade) was the more dejected, who could not so well disguise his intended enterprise of setting on foot a mighty and pow-erfull Army against Castrior, but that it took vent, and was discovered (by his neerest and greatest favourites) to Scanderbeg, who hereupon slept not in fecurity; but gave a general order to raise instantly the forces of his whole Country, and to fortifie and strengthen the Fortresses, Cities and

In this Equipage he comes to beffege Alba and other Cities, upon which he gained nothing but the diminishing of his forces, which though daily recruited by the new supplies which came to him, yet so mouldred away, that the poor old Ottoman assamed of the loss of so many of his men, Amusts for- was conftrained to retreat, quit Epire, and in all hafte marched away : whilft Scanderbeg with ced to retreat, all might and main pursued them, and gleaned up and destroyed such a multitude, as the shame Cafries belie thereof made the Great Turk at last so impatient, that he commanded the Balha of Romania, ges Fetigrade to flay behind with thirty thousand horse to secure the safe retreat of the residue of the Ar-

But Amurath had scarce taken up his Quarters in his own Countrey, when news was brought him that Scanderbeg had laid fiege to Sferigrade, whereupon he determines to return by the Anuraibs same way he came, and sends Sebalias to besiege Croye, and he and his son Mahomet invaded Epire, second fame way he came, and fends Sebalias to beliege Croye, and ne and nis ton Mahomes invaded Epire, about the end of April, and came himlelf in perion before Croye, and held it belieged above voyage unto Epire, and liege to the control of the contro four moneths; in which time a very great number of his Forces were loft. He endeavoured of Groycin to batter it with thirty peeces of Cannon, and other warlike instruments, and Engines, but vain, could do little execution, the place being very ftrong on all parts, and replenished with a lively fountain of water within, and another in the fide of the hill behind a Rock. Nor must I forget to tell you that at the end of four moneths, a general affault was given by the enemies, and maintained fo furiously on each part, that lasting but five hours, four thousand men remained dead upon the place, although the Turks power, strength, and cunning, could not gain the place (as I have faid) but after all this, the faid City rather lifted up her head against the Ottoman fury as Villrix.

Nor will I derogate from Vranocontes, but allow him all the honour due to his great deferts: and as this Governour appointed by Scanderbeg to command Croje, was vigilant and dexterous to oppole Amurath; so his Prince was not alleep in creating other imployment for his Forces elsowhere for as Octoman had given him a very hot Allarum, Scanderbeg with a party of his choice horse falls so desperately upon the Enemies Tents, at the said siege, as that Amurath could not at that time compais his defigns, nor take the place, although he difpatcht away Seremet with four thousand horse to repulse Scanderbeg, and Mahomet likewise though in vain pursued him with all possible speed, conceiving so great a hatred against him, as that after the death of his father, he abated nothing of his pernicious and evil affection to-

And though death prevented the malicious defigns of Amurath, yet it could not make any alteration in the heart of his Son Mahomet the second (and not the first, as by a mistake it flipped in this work) who took Constantinople, and was thereby the more enraged against the Christians, then he was before. However the state of affairs at this time so distracted him, Mahomet the that he was constrained to send Ambassadours to desire a Truce, which was resused him, and second desires an answer was returned to Sangeas the Deputy, who was fent to conclude the peace, that a truce with he should be gone presently; as for Castriot he would not make any peace or agreement with Castriot, is dethe Infidel, unless he restored him those Cities which Amurath had unjustly usurped. In the mean nyed, time Mahomet retires, and was a long while before he could fettle himself in his Fathers Dominions, and therefore could not for that time do Castriot any great harm. And Scanderbeg being willing to have an heir to succeed him (and being thereunto requested by his subjects took to his lawfull wife the most vertuous and fair daughter of Prince Aranith Conyno, called George Cafri-Doneca; with whom he could not live long in quiet. For fo foon as this new Turk was fet- ots marriage, led in his Fathers Throne , he began to threaten Castriot our Christian Prince , being not able to endure he should have such Dominion over Croye and the rest of Epire. Nor did I hereintend to have fet down the undertaking of Scanderbeg to affilf Ferdinand the Son of Alphanic Castriotrelieves King of Naples, had not the severall Historians who have written thereon, omitted how he Alphanic form did redeem this poor King, who was reduced to that milery and non-plus, as that he wasimprisoned in the Town of Bary, by the siege which the Count Picevin had laid to it, who made as sure of him, as if he had been already intangled in his net. But as soon as the arrival of Scanderbeg was known , Duke John of Sore , and the Count Picevin packed up their baggage. railed their fiege, and in great hafte, marched thirty miles from thence, to avoid the fury of that Fleet, and those which accompanied Scanderbig, who had so good success in repulsing Ferdinands enemies, that to him alone doth belong the honour of recovering of that Kings Crown. But the affairs of his own Kingdom wanting his direction, he was conftrained to quit all , and to return to Croye , near unto which place the Christians had erected an inex-pugnable Fortrefs (fufficient to hinder the passages of the Infidels) upon an exceeding high Mountain called Modrica, and having furnished it with Victuals, Artillery, and Munition, made fuch opposition against the attempts of the enemie, that it secured the pass, wherefore Ma- sinam Samiat homes fainting under so many attempts made upon him, dispatches away a famous Captain sent by Mahocalled Sinam, with five and twenty thousand Turkis horse against Scanderbeg, to surprise him mer against on a suddain, thinking the war of Naples from whence he was but lately returned, had made Castriotis dehim secure and careless. But Scanderbeg who always slept with his eyes open, had opportunely, fince his arrival, fent his Spies abroad, and renewed his intelligence with those neer the Sultan . whereby he had timely notice to prepare and to get the first into the field. But kept himself private and close, expecting the advance of the San-jac Sinam, and then marched the whole night towards him, during the obscurity whereof, and contrary to the knowledge of his advertary, with eight thousand fighting men horse and foot, he possessed himself of the Mountain Mocrea, and there resolutely expected Sinam, that being the Avenue through which he was of necessity to pass, and falling upon him unawares, defeated him with all his Army, where the flaughter was fo great that two parts of three fell upon the place, and all the En- Affunbeg invafignes and Baggage became a Prey to the Christians; and all the Generall could do was to ding Epire, is fave himself in this desperate fight, by avoiding it with extraordinary speed. And also discomfir-Assambeg, or according to others, Amesabeg, was advanced already on this side of Octide, accompanied with thirty thousand fighting men, but Scanderbeg being accompanied onely with four thousand, encountered him in so opportune a place, that he soon vanquisht them : the Guards on each fide of this Turkif General were fmitten down to the ground, his horse hurt, and himself wounded in the right Arm with an Arrow, knew no better way at last to fave himself, then to make trual of a Christian Climency aswell as of the Martial fury of an enemy. Before whom being brought, together with divers other Captains, the tears flanding in his eyes, and his hands lifted up to heaven, he fpake in this manner to Scanderbeg. That being in the fervice of the great Turkish Emperor, his honour obliged him to ferve him faithfully, and therefore implored his mercy, favour and clemency, whole speech took so well with Scanderbeg, that he pardoned them all, and gave them their lives, paying ten thousand Ducats for his own, and four thousand Ducats for the ransom of the rest, which was performed accordingly. I knowmany have accused Scanderbeg for being so easily perswaded by the Turk, and blame him that he knew not how to use his advantage against the Sfeigradians, who indeed furprifed him at that time. But here we are not upon the same terms, the victory was already in Scanderbegs hands, whose humanity becomes so much the more to be admired, as being exercised against a Capital enemy, whom we can feldom spare when he is once intrapped. But he shewed a far greater mildness towards the Venetians , with whom (to his great regret) he had a sharp and hard war. But in regard it would have been accounted a folly, and have proved a great disparagement to lose a mans right for want of looking after it , he would not therefore feem eafily to quit the fuccession of that , which he pretended was faln unto him by the death of Lech Zachary, and wherein the Venetians opposed him, by reason of an agreement made between them and the Lady Boffe, the mother of the deceased party. Notwithstanding which, Scandarbeg claimed that there being no Will, he ought to succeed Zachar) (who was murthered by Leg Dulagin, the son of the Lord of Saint Pant) and seemed to have the best title as lawful heir to the estate. But after a great contestation, they resolved the sword should decide the quarted on both sides, wherewith he pressed them so hard (although he abated very much to the rigor he exercised towards the Insidels and Turks) that the Ventions had no other expedient, but to defire a Peace with him, which yet they would not conclude it but upon their own conditions, though they were reduced to fuch extremity, as that if Scanderbeg had not condefcended, they had in all likelihood been destroyed; but he confidering, That the vertue, valour, and magnanimity of a valiant warrier, appears not in being ernel to an enemy, chofe rather to mitigate the appenie of revenge, by mildness and kind ulage; and therefore yeelded freely to forgo that which of right belonged unto him, although it was never his Custom to quit any thing to Infidels, as appeared clearly in the encounter with the Tyrant Sebalie, who belieged Belle Grade, where he defeated four and twenty thousand Turks, took fix thousand prisoners, and set at liberty four thousand Christians, who were detained by the Balbaes, Moyles, Affambeg, Isaac, and Sinambeg, and put to death more then fifty thousand of his enemies; and almost as many more two years after, under the command of the Basha Ballabam.

These and the like valorous exploits, pleased so well the most part of the Christian Princes, that they were thereby provoked to take up Arms against Mahemet, and Pope Pin pioully moved, seeing the affection of this noble Captain, to the utter extirpation of the Infidels, stirred up all Christian Kings, Princes and Potentates to Arm themselves against the Turk, and knowing that there could not be George Castrior an abler Captain chosen to that purpose, then Scanderbeg, to curb and tame the Barbarians, elected created chief and named him the Captain of the League, with promise to make him King, not onely of all Albania of the Christi- or Epire, but also of Macedonia, which holy undertaking was interrupted by the death of Pissa and Pope Paul the fecond; although our Albanian King travelled fince to Rome, to summon the Pope to joyn in a defign to profitable for the fafety, and enlargement of Christendom. Finally, finding himfelf frustrated of the succors he expected from the Kings and Princes on this side, he went to Liffa upon the River of Cliro, to consult of the Occurrences of the war with the Deputy Provedor of Venice, where he was seised on by a deadly Feaver, and feeling himself strucken by death, he made his Will, and George Castriot recommended his little son John, his wealth and Countrey to the care of the State of Venice, who in remembrance and gratitude for the advantagious peace he had freely granted them, created him and his posterity (after they had cast lots) with an universal consent to be Citizens of Venice. A few days after he departed hence to the other world , in the threescore and third year of his Age , and four and twentieth of his Reign (for he began his Reign, the eight and twentieth day of November, in the year 1443 and dyed in the year 1467) his body was interred in the Church of Saint Nicolas in Castriots death List, with great Pomp and magnificence, whose bones rested enclosed in this place in peace, untill Mahomet came into Epire some four years after , to affault Scutari. I have formerly observed the great care the Barbarians took to find out the bones, of him whom they so much feared, whilst his soul and body acted so vigoroully together, as that they would flye away in a maze at the very sound of his name. However I can hardly be induced to believe that the Turks honoured him fo much as Paulus Jovius affirms they did , nevertheless I will not say , but that they might have a greater esteem of his Noble Acts; then of another mans, fith those many famous exploits which are recorded to have been done by him by natural strength and dexterity of body, might induce the Turks to have a reverent effeem of him. As that wilde Savage Bull of an extraordinary fury and greatness, committing a thoulard spoils and murthers in the Countrey of his Sifter Mamiza, whose neck he quite cut through with one blow of his Cimiter on horseback. That monstrous Boar of Apoville, which had wounded so many of King Ferdinands Courtiers, which beaft he affaulted in the same manner and with like dexterity he cut off his head in the open field before the King, as they were a hunting And it is also reported of him, that after, the encamping of Bullaban before (170)e, there being brought to him chained and fast bound together, fortima and Heder, the brother and Nephew of Bullaban, their fight (putting him in remembrance of the cruelties acted through Ballabans occasion, upon the perfon of Moffs and his companions.) but him into fuch a whement Patton of anger against them, that he had no patience to fuffer others to fall on them, but in great fury fell on them himself, and at one blow hewed them both through the body with his Cimiter; Which was a Damasked one, of an ex-cellent goodness, two of which he always wore in one Scabberd; both which were often broken or fooiled in one Battel. And Mahomes (having heard of the excellency of fuch a fword which would cut afunder Gantlets, Helmets, and other ftrong Armour) as they were once in a Treaty, fent to defire it for a prefent, and the Sultan cauling tryal to be made thereof by the best Arms of the Court and the ftrongeft, and no fuch miracles proceeding from it as was boafted of, he thereupon caused it to be returned to Scanderbee, faying, That he gave him no thanks for such a present, when he could buy as good and a better one for his money; and that he would no longer believe that which was reported of it. But Scanderbeg having made more extraordinary proofs thereof in the presence of the Messenger, sent him word, That the versus was not altogether in the sword, but in the Arm which he reserved to himself , to be imployed against his enemies. And Mahomet might believe him, having feen the victories he gained in Duels, and particular Combats, when he fought at Andrinopolis, against a Sevenian: and at Burfe, against fair and Zampza, &c.

Homar the seconds Army , who succeeded Mahomes in the Priefthood of the Alcoran , about the year of our Lord fix hundred fifty fix, and reigned fifteen years, bearing the title of Admirall, which the Athenians called Charadinkis a' Emir Quibir, which fignifies in the Morabian tongue Great Lord, or Captain of the Sea. After which the Governours of Egypt took upon them the name or title of Soldan , which fignifies as much as King or Lord ; which title continued under the Name of Chaliphe, untill the time of Saladin, who conquered Jerusalem , taking it from the Christians, and who strengthened himself (chiesly) with the power and valour of the Mammelucks , a name which fignifies no other thing in the Syriak and Tartarian Language, then Slaves. About the year eleven hundred eighty seven. Saladin being dead, and the Royall race failing, the Mammelak; put it to Piperickchosen an Election, and (accordingly) among themselves made choice of one Piperick Soldan, who was a valiant and expert Captain. This man caused many lofty Buildings and Edifices to be erected, most part of which are at prefent ruined, as I my felf have feen. But the Arabians have often told me, according to what is written in their Histories, that those buildings were finished by a Governour of the Countrey, called Gelan. This custom of Election continued untill the year fifteen hundred and feventeen, at which time Sultan Selym the Tarkift Emperour, and Solymans Father, put to flight and vanquished Campson Soldan of Eyps and Spria, by reason that this man (who being but a child, was brought from the cold Countrey of Tartary, and was bred a Slave in the Seraglio of Cair, and growing up to years, did learn amongst them the Discipline of the Mammelaks, and attained to all the degrees of knowledge in the Military Art) Selym his enemy being, advertised that he savoured the King of Persia, warred against him, in which War Campson was stain in a Bantell, being seventy years old: Presently after which the Mammeluke, and the Arabians (at that time their Confederates) made choice of Tamombey Circaffe for their Soldan; Hemir being at that time a valiant man of Alexandria, and who altogether addicted himself to Warlike affairs ; he having (often times) fought against divers parts of Afa, and afterwards put the Turks to flight, to their great confusion; Being certainly advertised that Selym was coming against him with full resolution to fight him, he did make preparation to receive him, and pitched his Camp without the City of Caire, in a place called the Matairee, being the most beautifullest and pleasant place which was about the City, on that fide on which Selym made his approaches who marched towards him with great courage. Tamomben, having fortified himfelf with Artillery, Trenches, and Pallizadoes, fallied out, and Solym Sultan when both Armies were come up to each other with great courage and equall hope of victory, which devades Tanas pended on the fole hazard of one Battel, (neither part being ignorant that the contest was both for life ber. and Empire) The Turks according to the Turkish manner, sounded the Trumpets, and beat the Drums. and their enemies being over-matched by their strength, the Mammelucks were enforced to retreat into the City. At the first entry the Turks made, four and twenty thousand of the Citizens were flain, and as many more, (if not a greater number) at the taking of the City. In the mean time there were a very great multitude of women children and flaves, and all forts of Tradefmen, in the windows, cafting out great square pieces of stone, beams, and timber, bars of Iron, wild-fire, and scalding water, and other things of defence, and engines of War upon their enemies: The fight was fo fierce for eight hours together, that you might behold flaughtered men lying by heaps, tumbled one upon another, and their blood running down the ftreets like a river, which I heard from above four hundred old Manmelucks and Fews, who were in this War, in the life of the Soldan. Which fury of the Citizens caused Selvm (to the intent he might thereby terrifie the common people) to command certain houses, in the City, to be set on fire, by which means, and the noise of the Cannon, and volleys of shot, poured forth by the Fanizaries. he did so affright the inhabitants, and the stoutest Mammelucks, that seeing all things in a deplorable and a lost condition, they began to cry out from all quarters (thinking thereby to mitigate the Turks cruelty) Long live great King Selym, the favourite of the great God, whom we humbly befeech to ce, fe his fury, and to have pity upon his poor flaves, who do submit to his greatness and nervey. Yet all this Grand Court did not fuddenly appeale his rage, by reason of his great Governour an friend, named Ganus Baffa, who taken by scitia. was killed very near unto him, with an iron Mortar, cast down upon his head. Tamomtey having now left the defence of his Trenches, Rampars and paffages in the City, could not longer withftand the fury of the Enemy, but beholding the lofs of his valiant Captains, and the flower of his Cavalry, betook himfelf to flight, and happy were those Lords, who were able to gain the River Nile, and fly for succour to the strong Pyramides; some of which being three leagues distant from the City, were (the next day following) belieged by their Enemies, and were enforced, for want of victuals, (which Pyramides were erected in a barren and folitary place, as I can testific, having feen them) rendred themselves to the mercy of the Conqueror, who gave them their pardons; but ceased not (with five thousand horse) to pursue Tamombey, who had gained the ground of them, but being wholly routed, he rid with all fpeed (directly) to a fenny place or morish ground, full of Canes and Reeds, and his horse falling under him, and he feeing his enemies at his very heels, hid himself amongst the Reeds, but being discovered by two young Tamombey boys he crept along a little forwarder, (according to the opinion of the Arabians, and old Mamme-in a Caye. lucke) into a large vaulted Cave, at which I have been, and teen it, and not above fix years fince, there were found in it many fair Sepulchres, made after the Antique fashion, containing several mommyed bydies; and hard by it, in my time, there were also found more then three hundred bodies, amongst which were certain Idols, some of Copper, others of hard stone, which (I conceive) they worshipped in their life time, in the like manner as (heretofore) the Greeks and Romans did.

I know that Doctor Claudin Guichard, who hath collected the Funerals of the Ancients, makes a mock hereat, and feenis not to believe that which I have faid and written in my Cofmography; whereunto I arfiwer, that I speak not this by hearfay, but have travelled into, and seen those Coasts and Places. and the think it not creditable 1 will thew him fix of those said Idols, which were found in the like momb bed badies, and also two feet of a Child, brought hither by the Confull of Alexandria in Egypt, and prefented unto the Quein-Mother of the King, who afterwards tent them unto me, knowing that I delighted very much in such rarities; and although this Doctor cannot find these secrets in his Bartole, Gafon, and other famous Doctors, yet ought it not therefore to be concluded, that these things are not to be received by lovers of truth. But the Geographer Nicholas Nicholas opposeth him directly, and writes that fuch bodies were found from time to time, in the deferts of Arabia, by Merchants who travell from Egypt, to the Red fea; and that they make great efteem of them. But leaving the errors of Nicholay, I will return to our poor and wretched Tamombey, who thinking to fave himself in the faid Cave could not be fo well concealed there, but was taken to the great regret of all the people of Egypt Tamombey difand Arabia; with three hundred of the bravest and eldest Captains of his Army, most of which stan- covered in the ding upon their guards, (as forefeeing what would become of them) chole rather to lofe their lives Cave and tavaliantly, then to be put to ignominious deaths; the rest were taken alive with Tamombey, and led to the City of Caire, where the next day, and for several days after, Selym (forgetting all Regall clemency, and just humanity, which (in reason) he might have suffered his cruell heart to have been possessed with) bebaved himself most inhumanely towards Tamombey, to make him confess where his Treasure was, which Tamombey torhe had inherited of Campson: and being thrice tortured and racked with grievous torments, yet would tured to discohe not confess any thing; wherefore Selym would needs fee him, to question and confer with him, who wer his Treabeing brought into his chamber, remained as refolute and constant as ever he had been. Afterwards, when fures, he had been ignominiously led up and down the streets upon his Camell, his throat was cut in the common Shambles, on the thirteenth day of the moneth of April, in the year of our Lord one thouland five financially put hundred and seventeen, being of the Age of threescore and five years. But he was not publickly hanged, to death. as (amongst others) Paulus Jovius, and Munster have exprest in their Writings.

THE LIFE OF ATABALIPA, King of Peru.

Ann. Mund.

An. Dom. 1526.

He Tuga's were the most Noble, Richest, and powerfullest men of the Land of Pern ; a cruell , warlick , and extream politick people, descened from Tignicala, (a People to called) deriving their names from a City, fituated near to a Lake, in the Province of Colao, about ten leagues from Cufco, fo called from the abundance of Lead and other metals which are found there , by the inhabitants called Tichior.) The first King was called Zapalo, of whose linage Popaopangui and Guyanacapa were descended, who was the Grandsather of Atabalipa, who as he boasted, came from towards the River of Maragnon, being of the race of the Cannibals, which he evidently manifested by his bravado's, and the small account he made of Christians, whenfoever he could get footing in their Countries. Yet the inhabitants are a civill people, peaceable, and of a reasonable good behaviour; but that they are as much troubled with defires to attain unto the honours and great preferments of the world, as the people of Cusco, and those of Popaian and the bordering Provinces do. Now Asabalipa King of Cusco had a Brother called Atoco, who was a Juga, that is a King of Guiafcart. This Atoco being arrived at Canna, was very well received, honoured and reverenced by the people, though he were cruel. Atabaliya being jealous of the fortune of his Brother, procured his death; and feizing on his Dominions, he upa.

Aubalips pro- made choice of the City of Cuseo, the chief and Metropolitan of all Pern to dwell in , it being the cures his bro- ancient habitation, and Court of the Juge's and Kings, as Rome formerly was of the Empresser; Constantinople of the Turks; Tauris of the Sophi's; Cathan of the great Cham of Tartaris, and Grand Cayro of the Sultan of Egypt. The faid Cufeo being best structed in all Parm, in the middle of those Provinces which were formerly governed by the Juga's. After the death of Atabalipa's great And alips any great Grandfather, he enlarged his Kingdoms, as well on the fide of the Sea of Su, or peacefull, as on the fide of the great Ocean making the people tributary unto him. But as misfortune fals Kingdom. often upon great ones, as well as upon poor men, it happened in my time, that the Spaniards being The Spaniards covetous of the worlds wealth, failed toward a Land called Numbre de dies, under the conduct of a under Frank under Francis

Franci barous people; and being informed of King Atabalipa's Treasures and Riches, to gain his friendthip, Pifarre lent unto him many gifts and prelents, letting him understand that they were offered him by his Master the Ciriftian Emperour, and that he defixed to contract an Amity with him, and to treat freely with his Greatness without any sear; and that in case he did come to visit him, he should not be frighted to see them mounted on such great creatures which were very docil, and the which they had brought with them out of their Countrey, to carry them through the difficult passages, Rivers, Sands, and other inconveniences, which as he was told were in his Countrey, and Thepretended tould not be passed on foot without a great deal of danger to their persons. The Barbarian hearing Pilare toward this message, began to laugh and mock those which were sent by Pisarre, saying that those great Atabality. Mustaches (meaning the Spaniards) if they attempted any further than they had done, upon his Dominions, he swore by the Sun, and the Image which he worshipped, that he would cause them all to be cut in pieces : But Pifarre not being difmaied at Atabalipa's threats, performed an Exploit, befeeming a very valiant Commander; for being affured that the Enemies Army was not plots betterning a very variant Commander; not come affembled, and that it was but eight days fince he had furnisoned his Captains of the Provinces of The craft of Cusco, Quito, Calicuciva, Caxamalca, Tumbez, Pune, Nicaraga, and being moreover informed that he could not affemble his Army on a sudden, Pifarre fent other presents to the Heathen prize Arabasipa King, purposely to gain time, and the better to stave him off from uniting his Forces, he sent him two Horses richly harnessed, and Caparison'd, and thus by degrees gained upon him, defiring that before he went out of his Countrey, he might be permitted to fee the great magnificence and glory of his Court, that so he might make report thereof to the Emperour his Master; who would be very much pleafed to hear of the greatnels and magnificence of fo powerfull a Prince, as Atabalipa was.

And the better to entrap him, he caused him to be informed of the great Majesty and excellency of fuch an Emperour as his Mafter was, unto whom the Christians did take it for a great honour to render obeyfance, and to be fubject unto him : Inviting him by these means to be pleased to make a League, Confederacy, and Alliance with him, to the end that by this proceeding of his , two fuch great Princes might have the better opportunity to keep all fuch men under, as should dare to attempt any thing against their estates; which indeed is the true way, whereby States and Principalities may be fetled, for as much as it is an usuall practife; and that Force cannot so soon break an united body, chiefly when it is thus powerfull and strong. But this was not the thing Pifarre aimed at; for he onely attempted to get footing on the Frontires of Atabalipa's Territories, affuring himself that he would quickly fet it on his neck, as afterwards he did, as we shall understand by the enfuing part of this discourse.

Now this Mafter Spaniard obtained fo much by his smooth language, and forged inducements, as Pilarry Forces thow this matter by and approaching with all his Horfe and Foot near unto the City of Caffaget entrance, malca, he discovered the Enemies forces to be at leaft thirry thousand in number, being for the discovered the second of the second o most part naked men, some excepted which were clothed with Cottons, interlaced with divers co- Enemies lours, and with plumes of Feathers, having for all defence nothing fave wooden fwords, clubs, and ftrength, Bows and Arrows. Pifarre beholding the fierce countenances of the favage people, approaching Pifarres labulations. by degrees the one near unto the other, gave order to the Spanife Cavalry to skirmish them on all tyto diaw the fides, and by their alluring them to Battel, to make feverall flews as if they did run away, and the Pernolans to a Foot to do the like, whereupon the Enemy began to take courage, chafing the Christians close at Battel. the heels; when as Pifarre commanded two and twenty pieces of Cannon to be fired upon them. which fore amazed these poor people, who had never seen any Horses before, much less heard such a noise of Ordinance, whereby above seven thousand of the Heathers were slain out right: The The Peravious refit took their flight to the upper grounds and mountains, being swiftly pursued by the Spaniards, overcome by who that day and the next killed twice as many of them, sparing neither strong nor weak, old nor young, except Atabalipa, and fix more of his Counfell, who were taken in a Tent, bravely adorned with Feathers, near unto a River called in their Gibbridge Chelcaion, as I was told by a Spaniard in the City of S. vill, who was in the Battel, and had received two shots with their Arrows. Pifarre having got the Victory, came near to Atabalipa, and laying his hand on his shoulders in token of friendship, he held many loving discourses with him; which being ended, the Captive King privately drew out of his bosom two round fine Pearls, as great as a Date-plum, joyned together Presents given with two Emeralds, the one made like a little Bell, the other like an Oval, of an incredible value, to Pifare. which he gave to the Conquerour, that he might be always continued in his favour, and that his life might be fived, promiting unto him infinite Treafures; and endeavouring by all means possible to content the covetous mind of the Spaniards, whose onely aim was to enrich themselves. But this Cacique now Captive Atabalipa could never fatisfic Pifarre; although he had paid him his ranfom Cuelty used in pure Gold, which he had sent for from all the Provinces which he possesses, evento the upon Atabalipa spoiling the golden Idols which were in the Temples, to the value at least of ten millions of Gold which did him but very little good, for as much as a few days after, his body was bound and made faft to a Tree with cords (as if he had been the most miserable creature in the world) three whole days and three nights together, to make him confels if he had any more wealth; upon which occasion not apprehending death in the least, he uttered a thousand reproaches against Pifarre; affuring him, that the God which Pifarre worthipped (and whom he faid was a just God) would in a short time punish him and his brother also, which likewise happened, for a while after Francis Pifarre was killed, and his brother Ferrand Pifarre was beheaded in the fame Countrey. Now those of Pifarres Counsel being at odds, and disagreeing, whether or no they should kill this Atabatics. King, or fend him to the Emperour Charles the fifth, at last they concluded that he should be strangled, which was done, the night after he was condemned, by the advice of a Counsel of some Bistops and Monks, for fear he should be rescued by his own subjects. It was a Morian

Some I know have written that he was burned alive, which was but a meer supposition, as I was assured by one who was present at his death: And by the fentence, the Spaniards laid no other thing to his charge, fave that he had caused his brother Atoco of Guiefcart to be put to death, and had fpoyled his Countrey which he had invaded This King was a famous personage, and a great lover of vertue, and had caused many stately Temples to be built, and enriched about twelve years before his death. Pifarre suffered Arabalipa's body to be carried away by friends and confederates, and to be honourably buried in the place where his predeceffors lay; and although he had two hundred and twenty Wives alive at the lame time when he was taken, yet had he but two daughters of an indifferent age: He died being fifty two years old, Some ignorant Authours, 1 know, have wrote Atabalipa's life quite contrary to the truth; boafting that they had been in his Country, where I know they never were: and amongst others, one Jerom B. nzoni brags thereof, in a little book called The History of the New World, printed at Geneva; and I am vext that it was illustrated with so many discourses of M. Urban Chanveron, which small History was stoln out of the Works of Francis Loup de Gomarre, a Spaniard, which the rather induced me to write the History of Atabalipa, whose Picture I give you as I brought it from those parts with many others, which I keep by me as rarities, and things of value. Moreover I cannot choose but wonder at some giddy brain'd sellows, who are offended at Pifarre for giving leave unto Atabalipa's friends to bury h m honourably; and though I intend not to exclaim against the Spanards infidelity, mended for gi-by breaking his promife with this poor King, after he had received fo great and excellive a ranfom wing the for from him, yet 1 shall point at examples enough, amongst the Pagans themselves, who, after the death of their enemies, have honoured them with decent burials, acknowledging with Denosthenes the bury their ing of their enemies, have nonounced the bury their ing of Envy and Malice, during their life time, yet when they are dead, they are freed from it: Which reason moved so many brave and excellent Captains to treat their enemies more humanely after their death, then they would have done whilft they lived. To which purpose Hamibal (who acknowledged that it was better to kifs a dead tain have ho- enemy, than to fight with a live one, forafmuch as a dead enemy cannot bite) a fworn and Capital foeto the Romans, having defeated and killed the Confull Caise Flaminius, near unto the Lake of Perufe, with well nigh fifteen thousand of his Souldiers, he used all diligence to get the body of the dead Confull, for whom he made an honourable Funerall; and he used also the same piety toward Tiberim Gracehus, who he surprized by the Ambuscado's of the Lequeses. As also Marcus Marcellus and Emylim Panlm, deleated in the Battel of Cannes. So likewife the Conful Lucim Cornelim harboured the like neeknes, when he caused Hannon the Generall of the Carthaginians to be taken up from his own Tent, and to be carried honourably to his buriall. 1f then the Pagan Captains, (without fear of being difgraced)did permit, purchased and procured the Funerals of their mortal enemies, wherefore should any man find fault with Pifarre, for permitting the dead body of Atabalipa to be honourably buried by his own subjects? yet however we see some were offended at it. Others take unto themselves a licence to urge the most phantasticall buriall for him that can be imagined. In the fame fictitious mould (for otherwise I could hardly believe it) the Munsterian Reformer, and after others concer-ning the coll of him Guichard the Doctor of Funerall Ceremonies , have fancied stories , and published them, conthe Funerals of cerning the Sumptuous Tombs and Monuments of the men of Peru, which the judicious Reader those of Pern. may plainly discover at first view: as first, he seems much to imitate Rablais, when in the ninth (hapter of his third book of Funerals, he builds the Magazin for Mammies in the houls of the high Mountains of the Countrey and Kingdom of Cufco, and of the Tombs of Colao, to which purpoie he fends back the druggifts into these Countries all along the mountains, which lie most exposed to the Northwind. I will not here tax him with want of experience, forafmuch as I know that neither Guichard, nor his Author ever made a voyage to far as I have done. Onely I shall intreat them to enquire of the Spanish Merchants which trafique to the Fairs of Lyon, to wit, whether the good Mummies which the Druggifts use are found in those parts? and then (for I presume, had he known better, he durft never have written such an untruth) he will learn that there is no more new things there, than at his Laguien. Moreover he is the more ridiculous, for those trifles which he adds after his Benzoin , that the men of Pern, together with the dead bodies, do bury a great deal of wrought Gold and Silver, as also the fairest and choicest of all their Wives, servants, utenfils, bread, wine, and such other necessaries for them to eat and drink until they be gotten into the other world. These will need ounpeacount but one fingle word to make you schfible of the weakness of these tales: For how can it be imagined affected at the they should compals that wine which he saies they bestow on the dead? Since in the Continent of Peru, and the Land of America, from one Pole to the other, there is not one fingle Vine-flock planted that brings fruit to maturity: But it may be Guichard with the rest of his Authors, confounds the wine wah all other Liquors, orat least with that which all the great Lords of Peru use in stead of wines. And as to the Sepulchre of the King of Cufeo, which Guichard (after the Spaniard Lopez, in the fix score and sourth Chapter of his Indian History) represents, as being placed in the middle of a Chappe' the pavement whereof was all of Gold; Truly 'tis pity he made not the fides and feeling of the one; and though in his own conceit he had well adorned the Building, yet the Foundation is as unc a cain as the hopes of thiose who are accultomed to build Castles in the air, and feed themselves

The end of the Life of Atabalipa.

THE LIFE OF

fohm Guttemberg, a Moguntian, the Inventor of the Art of Printing.

Ann. Mundi 5390.

Nat. Christ!

Mongst the rarest and laudablest Inventions which were devised by the Ingenuity of man, we must needs confess, That the Art of Printing may at present justly claim the best and highest esteem; whereby all the other Arts and Sciences are so plainly and accurately rendred unto us; and whereby two men, in one day, may dispatch and Print off more Books whereby two men, in one day, may dupaten and rrint our more books then several men could before have written in a whole year. This Arr Printing where, where (as it is generally believed) was first invented at Moganita, or Mante, a and by whom City in Germany, in the year of our Lord one thousand four hundred invented fourty and two, by John Guttemberg, a German Knight, of an honoura-ble Family; who first of all did there make the experiment of the faid Art, and did also make the first trial of that Ink which to this very day is used by the Printers: Although some other Writers do af-firm that John Faultus, and Your Shopen, two years before invented this said Art, and so give them the A difference concerning praise of it; And onely say that this John Guttemberg, John Mantel, John Pres, Adolph Rusch, Pe- the Inventors zer Sheffee, Martin Flache, Uldric Hen, John Froben, Adam Peter, Thomas Wolff , and others, did of Printing. all at once very much perfect this faid Art of Printing , which they did spread throughout all Germany and the adjacent Countries. And indeed Corradus did use this Art at Rome, in the year fourteen Corradus prints' hundred. In the beginning of which Profession the grounds of it were known but to a very sew per, edar Rome, fons : for at fuch times as they had any thing to Set , they brought their Characters with them in bags, and when they had done, they carried them back again. And in those days, both the Printers, and such as did make the Letter-Moulds, were in a great repute, wealthy and opulent, and reverenced as Noble personages, making a vast profit by the said Art. But at present, by reason of the infinite multitude of Books which are printed, and that all men are permitted to profess that Science, although they have never fo little infight in it; it fo fals out, that both the Composers and Primers, reap thereby neither profit nor praise, but onely imploy their labour and time to the benefit of the Publick, with avery little Profit or Thanks to themselves.

Some Authours have written that the Art of Printing came first from China and Cathan, which was Printing agreat mistake in them, seeing the Kingdom of China and the East-Indies were not discovered by should have agrees muses in the process of the p Printing was invented and practifed in Enrope, in the year one thousand four hundred fourty and na and Cabbe.

two, as we have formerly faid. True it is that Paul the Venerian did four hundred years ago, or thereabouts, write the first description and fituation of those Countreys, and their Cultoms, but he doth not at all mention that Printing was in use there; And that which makes me the more confident is, that both the Grecians, Armenians, Mingrelians, Abiffinians, the Turks, the Mores, the Arabiant, and the Tartars, do write all their Books : Which became in use amongst the Turks, by the copunsand of Bajazer their Emperour, the second of that Name, by a Decree which was published in the year one thousand four hundred sourscore and three, forbidding Printing, or the use of printed Books, upon pain of death; which faid Ordinance was confirmed by his fon Selimu, the The Egyptians first of that Name, in the year one thousand five hundred and fifteen: Moreover my fell being in Egypt, Characters like I did there fee feveral long Table-books, composed of the barks of Palm trees, which were so well writunto Printing, ten, that you would have thought they had been Printed. And likewife the Merchants who travel from the Indies by the Red Sea, and who do traffick amidft feveral Nations; do onely write upon fuch

An errour that Table-books, Some other Writers have maintained that the Art of Printing was extant even in the Territories of Mexico, which is quite opposite unto Cathat, the one being in Asia towards the Antartick Pole; and the other in America towards the Artick Pole; but the said Authors are might been uted in the Territories tilly militaken, for as much as the Mexicans did never make use of the Art of Printing. However, I must needs confess that the Mexicans do make use of several Characters, resembling several Terrestrial, and Aerial creatures, as also the head , legs, arms, and other members of man , whereby they do explain their conceptions, as formerly the Egyptians did by their Hieroglyphicks, and likewise the Ethiopians; feveral of the like Characters having been publick and extant, whereof I my felf have a nike to the E- couple, which were written in the Cuy of Themistison, full of fuch like Figures and Characters, together with the Interpretation of them: Now as the Ancients did suppose one Goddess Pallas, who presided over Learning and War, as having sounded Learning, and invented Warlick instruments; fo the German; above all other Nations may attribute this glory unto themselves, to the born away the prize of both these faculties; Bartholdus Schwartz a German, having been the first Inventor of Powder and Guns, and John Guttemberg of the Art of Frinting: one onely default there is, which doth not a little dim the luftre of their glory; and by readon whereof they may be very well likened unto the Magnanimous and Warlick General Hamnibal, of whom it is faid, That he very well knew how to overcome and affwage the fury and impetuousness of an Enemy, but that he very well knew how to overcome and affwage the fury and impetuousness of an Enemy, but that he were well knew how to overcake he was a full full formation of the contract of the second and neglect. In the like manner the Gemmans are full of Invention, but they are so negligent and careless in the throughly polishing and bringing their inventions to perfection, as by reason hereof, the fame thing befals them which happened to the Hebrews, who, as they may juftly term them bringing it to bringing it to be the fame thing befals them which happened to the Hebrews, who, as they may juftly term them bringing it to bringing it to be the first Inventors of all Sciences, yet however other Nations by their labour and before the desired in the first Inventors of all Sciences, who are the first Inventors of all Sciences, who are the first Inventors of all Sciences and the sciences and the first Inventors of all Sciences and the first Inventors of all Sciences and the sciences an industry, do appropriate them unto themselves, by their refining of them, and thereby in a manner laying a certain claim unto them, and accounting them as their own, they do rob the first Inventors of the honour which they ought to reap upon that account.

Finally, This Noble Art of Printing cannot be fufficiently praifed and valued, by reason of the manifeft and great benefit, which, as we see, it doth daily bring along with it: For thereby we are affured that the Law of God is spread abroad throughout all the world, even amongst Barbarous and Savage people; that ignorance is hereby suppressed; and that all the liberal Arts and Sciences have been and are as yet thereby greatly Illustrated and Ennobled, by the multitude of rare Treatifes and excellent Books (unvitiated by the hands of fuch ignorant Clerks, as had well-nigh corrupted all the good Authors, by their erroneus Transcriptions) which at present are extant; and do daily How as it were unto us by the facility and eafinels of this admirable Art. And that we may not omit thole that have imbellished this famous Art, we shall onely name some few unto you, whose memories deserve to live to Posterity; as Aldui Manutiu at Venice, Frobenu and Operinus at Basilea in Germany, Christopher Plantin at Antwerp, Robert, Stephen, Henry, and Francis Plantin brothers, at Paris, Griphius; and Tornes at Lyons; and several others most learned and exquisite men in his Art, who have enriched the same, and still continue so to do with a great deal of Honour and applause throughout the world, &c.

Wrapt up in such dark shades, and shapes, that none Could them unfold, had not thy skilfull Art A means produc't, whereby thou doft impart What ere th' Almighty , by his powerfull hand, Effected hath, i' th' Heavens, i' th' Sea on Land : And unto us his Laws thou fetteft furth, In such an ample manner, as their worth Eternally to all Mankind appears; Their Praises Shall out-vythe length of Tears. Thy rare Invention, Guttemberg, doubtlefs, Not brooking Errour Should our Age oppress. Nor Ignorance flould gain the upper hand Of Knowledge, Learning, Science, and withstand The Truth; thee mov'd, those Treasures to bestow On us, which secrets were; and ne're did flow Save mid'ft the Gods; from Mortals being referv'd, Least such a knowledge (by them undeserv'd) Might elevate their generous Souls too high (A Soul too subtil, should she soar to nigh Th' Eternals secrets) and plodd to attain To hidden Mysteries; a Science vain, Which draweth down the Almightie's wrath on those, Who thereby strive his Dictates to oppose. But thou content'ft thy felf to make us know Th' Etherial Fabrick, and the Orbs below; And dost confine thy felf within the bounds Of th' Earth's round form, the which the Sea furtounds ? The ruddy circle of the daily Torch : The radiant Planets; and the Zones which forch: The wondross Changes of fair Cinthia's bowrs, Caufing both th' Ebbs and Floods, at certain bowrs; Which Noble Sciences, and many more, By Printing are disclos'd, and kept in ftore: And Guttemberg by his most Noble Art To me a thou sand such like doth impart: Thou canfest Savage Nations to be mild,

By reading of such Books as are compiled

On purpose to refine the stupid wit Of those who are unlearn'd, abfurd, unfit. Mid ft rationals t'appear, unless compos d By such rare dictates, as shou hast disclos d; For who can now excuse himself? and lay The blame on Ignorance? or Who can fay That fe is not unmaskt? fince by this skill, Gods Word is plainly known ; the which doth fill The world with wonder , for his Divine voice To as appears, in Characters most choice. And who can plead not guilty to the Laws, Since they are publick? It is that which aws The world , through which they run (on Paper fixt) Nay passthe Seas, where they are not Eclips't: But being there by all men under flood , A Terror to the bad , Reward to th' Good ; They home return again : where being observ'd, Each man may rest secure, and be preferv'd From harm. So when both letter, and the reason O' th' Law concurr, it needs muft be in feafon. God grant , in thefe our days , we neither mifs ; We need not hope, nor beg, a greater blifs. Hadnor the Art of Printing thus been found The Ancient Records must unto the ground, Useless have faln: And how should we have read (With so much ease, and little cost) or sped In the discoveries of things unseen? Thefe, as to me, extinguifhed had been : And though defirous to have understood Those rare composures, admirably good, Of grave Philosophers, and moft Divine Renowned Orators, whose Writings shine To all Posterities : These in a deep Ocean of mifts had fallen afteep with Guttemberg, had not his varer skill, Deriv'd them unto us , from their Learn'd quill. But now presented are unto our view Those Annals, which thoughold, are here made new. What Vertues Princes did poffefs, we read; And how they Afted many a Famous deed : How they their subjects Govern'd, and their State Preferv'd in Peace; feeking the Love, net Hate Of all men : Thefe were Courteous, Mild and Good : Others were Warlick, not to be withstood In their Attempts: Some Pions and Devout Others were Furious, Tyrants, Ruff and Stone.
What more by pleafing Hiltory may be known,
This Famous Art of Printing makes our OWN.

This Famous Art of Printing mages our ownish And to be brief; What can there be defir' as Or what thing was there as yet, e're inspired Into the mind of mortals, which this Art alone Doth not divustes, and anno us makes known? So that is may be call'd, The Art of Arts; The Memories relief; fince it imparts secrets unknown, and Myteries obfered:

Revives the Dead; And all men doth allowid I' Admire its worth: Chief Agent of the Gods It may be serm'd, fince things which are at odds It reconciles, and doubt ou we express
That which the Tonyne could not describe in less These hundreds of years, which is sets down

THE IFF

FERDINAND CORTEZ A Spaniard.

Spaniard

Might be counted very discourteous, if I omitted the Life of this famous man. is Might be counted very discourteous, it I omatted the Life of this famous man, who not only courts vertue in his name, but careffes her in his noble and generous actions, whereby he firives to be really fush, as his name imports, and to shew himself courteous to those, whose Nobility and Valour are enammell'd with Learning and Piety. The present Discourse will prove this, and make you admit the Pericetions of this Spaniard, whose Pourtraiture I got from a Sevil Merchant, at what time I, and some others were brought before the Inquisitor (upon St. Thomas day) by certain persons, who would needs persuade him that and Cortect. But his good man found us from all danger, knowing he some conference we

We were Lutherans; But this good man saved us from all dangers, knowing by some constrence we had together that he had seen meat whe candrian Egypt, when I was going to the Holy Land. This Merchant shewed me his Cabinet, furnished with many Pourtraitures and Figures of those who had been Travellers, among the rest was this, the which with some others he freely gave me.

Cortex was born in the Year, 1485. Under the Reign of Lord Ferdinand and Lady Islabel His Birth and King and Queen of Cafile and Arragon. His Father was Martin Cortex of Morrey, Son of Parents.

Ferdinand Cortex, who Conquered the Kingdom of Mexico. His Mother was Pisarro Altamirano, insomuch that he descended from sour of the most ancient and Noble Families in all that Country.

trey, viz. Cortez, Monroy, Pifarro and Altamirano. It is true they had no great store of Riches.

but they were attended with great honours, conferred on them by their Neighbours, who respected them, because they endeavoured to make themselves honourable in all their Actions. Being very young ne was made Lieutenant or a company of Gennets, for his Comin Appoint at the transfer of Capital Lieutenant of a company of the Squeens mind would make himself Master of his Order, which caus d Don Allont of Cardenas, Master of St. James, to make open War against him. In the mean while Cortez all fick, and green to extream weak, that he was more like to die then live. And therefore his Fatherstearing left he thould endanger his health by overhearing himself, took him off this Military Exercise, and so he sent him at sourteen years old to study in Sa-

wanted money, or else found no inclination to study, he returned to Medelin, where his Father and Mother being much troubled at his diffetuencis, that ply reproved him as one who had fruitzated their design of advancing him to great honours, would he but have studied the Civil Law But then to decide a controverfie in Law either by Tongue or Pen. Wherefore feeing his Parents very much against his being a Souldier, herefolved to ramble about the Countrey and try his Fortune: Two opportunities presented themselves to content this young Warrier, viz. A Voyage to Naples with a' Ovando, or d' Olanda, Commander of Larez, who was now to be fent by King Ferdinand in the quality of Vice-Roy to take Bombadilla. Cortez being at a stand which to chuse, in conclusion determined to fail into India, because Ovando knew him and would take care of him, the Mountains of Gold also, so much celebrated in India, made his mouth water, considering the vast riches he might gain by this Voyage; but amidft the thoughts of fetting forward with Ovando's Fleet, lo he relaps d into his Feaver, which marred all his defigns, whereat he was much grieved, hereby lofing fooner recovered, but he fteers his course into Italy, which he formerly contemn'd to follow Ovando and so goes to Valentia. But as the happy success of the Indians allured him to tread his former paths, so after he had staid one year (not without many troubles) wandring about, he returned back with a Refolution to go into India, from which his Parents could not divert him, although they oblong with him four more laden with Merchandile, and Sailing towards the West, he found out the Kingdom of Mexico; for leaving the Cape of Cuba, and the Illes of Jucarana and Coluacana on the left hand where he caused his fame to be spread abroad, he arrived to the great River Panuco. And here he understood this River belonged to the firm Land, which in its course ran into Urabanes, and passed Northerly through the Countrey of Bacealaura: Long had he not been in these parts, but he discovered by his two Interpreters which he brought out of the foresaid Isles, that in this Region the great and rich Kingdom of the Mexicans extended it felf towards the West, being stored with excellent and rare Workmen, Painters, Masons, and other very ingenious Artificers. At this news Ferdinand pricked up his ears, and from that time attempted to become their Master, but at the first he endeavoured to gain them by all possible kindness, and to win the hearts of the Mexicans by his courteous and fweet comportment, and indeed he was so assable and loving, that they thought him not to be a Spaniard. But this credulous People knew afterwards to their forrow of what mettle he was made, being very active to employ his Forces. For perceiving that these people fell out with one another about the boundaries and extent of their Countrey, he was eafily perswaded to aid a neighbour of his, a certain Lord in that Land against his Enemies, and therefore he makes a League with him tending much to his own Advantage, for he knew full well that this poor Lord being straitned on all hands, and at a loss what Saint to implore, would think it a great bappiness to have his affiftance, who had a company of Harquebuziers, Bow men and Pike-men, with a Squadron of Horse, which seemed dreadfull to these wretched Barbarians. The day of battle being come, Ferdinand placed his men (though few in number) in battle array, caufing his great Guns to play, and his Horses to neigh. The enemies were so scared to hear the thundring Canons roar, that after the loss of many men, they confess'd themselves vanquished, and submitted to the Conquerors; who at first seemed severe, because of a maxime received among them

Gentry his ferring out for an experiment of the strong out for the str to be cruel to those who rebel against them. Howbeit being advised by Cortez to take compassion on them, they kindly treated them for this Spaniards very fake; to whom they principally ascribed the Victory. After this Expedition Ferdinand perceiving himself strong in men and forces, began to quarrel with King Morzume or Montezume, who hearing of Cortez his power in that Countrey, conceived Morroune fets. a mortal hatred against the Christians, whom he perceived (being wife and subtil) inclined to usurp himself against the Territories and Dominions of Mexico, and therefore he consulted with one of his Lords and the Spiniards. Vaffals how to root them out, but this was done too rashly, seeing that Qualpopaca Lord of Namblan or Nancutel fince called Almeria, put nine Christians to death, which ministred an occafion to Ferdinand of taking vengeance, and executing that which for a long time he had contrived, but never could find a pretence for it till now; The murder of these nine inlarged the way, so that the thick and numerous ranks of Morzumes Army could not reful the thunder of Ferdinands Ordinance, which fulminated on these wretched people, nor the bloody wounds of the Spanish Ordinance, which minimized on their wretures people, not the beginning on borfeback to be fiving Morganic words. This terrible flaughter fo frighted the Mexicans (who thought men on borfeback to be King Morganic Centaures, and their intimate acquaintance with Jupiter to procure lightning from heaven) that they vanquithed. were glad to yield. Motzume also surrendred himself, and left all his people to Cortez his kindness, but after he had thus submitted, Ferdinand hearing there was a secret Rebellion in the Countrey, put him in chains, which fo inraged these Barbarians, that they furiously ran to the place where Motzume was imprisoned (whether it was to deliver him from the indignity he suffer'd, or else were vexed at his compliance with [orrez] and threw great stones at their King, wherewith (notwithstanding all the Spaniard) endeavours to drive them away) they miserably killed him and dash d out his brains, chusing another in his place called Qualitimoc or rather (according to others) Cuetravacin, Mot- Motzumes zum's brother, Lord of Islandipa. But the greatest part of the Lords elected Correz, who pursued death his competitor with fire and sword, and though he was chosen King, yet he would not accept that instomperion was content to be called Fiee-Roy. Now it was much eafter for him to overcome this last Correz would King then Morzume, because he discomfited Captain Narvez, who came to the City of Uray- be but Vite-Croix with nine hundred men, and a Commission from Diego Velasquaz, Governour of Cuba, to slay Roy.

Correct deteast Cortez, or rid the Countrey of him by force, because he had not given him an Account of his Voy- Narvez. age, or late Discovery. Cortez in the mean while being busie in deseating Narvez, found the Mexicans quite changed, who having armed themselves fell fowl upon the Spaniards left in the Garrison at Mexico under his Lieutenant Captain Peter Alvarado, and drove Cortez out of the City, where he thought to refresh himself after his weary travels, but was forced with those Spaniards which he brought from Narvez his defeat (in the Year 1121) to beliege Themistican, which continued three Cortez belieges moneths, at the end whereof he entred the City, but yet he and his men were cheated by the Mexi- Themislian. cans, who feeing themselves unable to hold out any longer, nevertheless knew the Spaniards design was to enrich themselves with the Gold and Precious Stones of that wealthy City, wherefore gathering together all their Gold and Silver, they cast it into the bottom of their Lakes. By this means the Spaniards found nothing in the Nest, which so inraged them, that they used all manner of cruelty towards these miserable wretches. Cortez was extreamly abashed, when after much diligent searching, he could not find one grain of Gold or Silver in the whole Town, nor any of Morzumer Trea-fure. And feeing he could not make them confels where they had hidden it (although he forely threatned them, and burned Qualtopaca for his former cruelty) he took King Qualtimoc and his Secretary and put them upon the Rack, and so miserably disjoynted and pull'd assunder their bodies, that King Qualitthey could be wire-drawn no longer, thinking to extort that by force, which he could not do by mee and his commands or threatnings, and yet for all these bitter Torments he could not get a word from them.

Some fay the Secretary was fo resolute, that though they burnt him and fryed him at a small fire, yet he

Rack d. would confes nothing, nor utter any thing befides bitter complaints against the villany of the Spaniards; he was dying about six hours in the Executioners hands. Cortex seeing the King also very The death of obstinate, caused him to be taken down from the Rack, and presently hanged him. When he had the Secretary. dispatch'd this Enemy, he began to search further, because he had heard from many, that Mexico The death of abounded with Gold and most excellent rarities enough to awake the dullest foul to a vigorous enquiry the King of after them, and to enlarge the renown of his valour and generous conquests, for if the relation of Mexico. his Voyages be true, he deserved according to his quality and condition to be reckoned among the chiefest Conquerors. You have heard the subtile stratagems, cunning devises and brave exploits wherewith Cortez perfecuted the Indians (but if you throughly confider the whole matter, as we have deroick Warriour) who learned like fools at their own cost to be wife. Now I will profecute some other Journeys and Travells which Correz made, failing through divers Seas to compleat his prosperous Voyage. For brevity sake I omit the Discovery which he made of a great and high Mountain, at the top white with snow, at the bottom vomiting flames, and throwing out red hot ftones like Mount Ains in Sicily; not that I would here excuse their morose obstinacy who will not believe what is told them, unless truth put out their eyes, but because I am not certain that I have elsewhere cleared this point. It will tend more to Ferdinands praise if I here make mention of his Piety towards the Church of God, which moved him to conquer the greatest part of this People, and reduce them both to the Christian Faith, and obedience to the Emperour Charles the Fifth. Not that I would play the fool like Paul Jovius, who represents Correz as an Hypocrite, The errour of under pretence of certain devotions, which Historians observe (too unadvifedly) he used in casting Paul Forist. lots upon the twelve Apostles, but this was an action fitter for a small-coal man, then such a gallant and valiant undertaker. The zeal which he had for Gods glory made him bring thefe sheep to Christs sold, which for a long time had been detained in the Claws of Wolves and devouring Lyons. And so much he christianiz'd them, that by a publick Order, two of the most illustrious Barons in that Nation were Two Ambastafent as Ambaffadors (nobly attended) to the Emperor in Spain, and from thence to the Pope in Rome dors fent from to tender their homage, who entertain d them with great joy and fplendor. After this, Cortex built avery thrule home at Themselfician reflecting to Royal Bullea existed with Market. a very starely house at Themistian, resembling a Royal Pallace, enrich'd with Marble and carved Pope.

clared it in Morzumes Life, he was guilty of extreams misbecoming the Christian piety of an He-

Stone-work, which the Spaniards affirm to be moreglorious then the Alambre in Grenada, because the Frontis-piece was inlaid with beautiful stones of divers colours. Indeed he might well build fo goodly aftructure, having received fo many rich prizes; for befides others, I find in the Provinceof Castile he had five Emeralds valued at an hundred thousand Crowns. One cut like a Rose with its Cortez his fair leaves, the other in form of a Bugle-horn, the third like a Fifh, the fourth in the likeness of a Bell, booties. having for its Clapper, a great Pearl, shaped like a Pear: the fifth like a Cup, for the which alone a Genoa Jeweller offered fourty thousand Ducats, hoping to be a gainer by the bargain. This sudden increase of Cortex, exposed him to envy, which as it never quits their company, who are a little exalted above others, entertained Correz in the same manner as she had formerly done Columbus. Hereupon he was recalled into Spain, where he bestowed upon the Emperor precious stones of inestimable vain was retained into principle.

BASIL Duke of Moscovy.

Basile Duke of Muscovic Dixit Anno Christi 1518

Aving already at large described the Original manners and Government of the Moscovites in my Cosmography, I here omit them, and shall briefly touch upon the most remarkable things in this present History, not medling with the ancient regulation of this Countrey, nor the progress or various success of the Russian affairs: But yet I will not forget to make some singular Observations, which before I passed over in silence, and may serve now to illustrate this Narration. In the Year 1576. An English Lord, who had been an Embassador Refidentiary feven years in Mofeovy, told me, that the natural Inhabi-rants thereof are the most cruel men in the World against their Enemies, not that they devour their the great cru-Captives, but make them feel the Rigour of that Machiavilian Polition, viz. A dead enemy bites Molecoites. not. As for their Wives and young Children, they fell them to Tarkiso or Targaian Merchants, and though they are Christians, yet they commonly traffick in them. Printing was not known printing when to them until the Year, 1560. and then discovered by a Russian Merchant who fold Characters discovered in for the Prefs, by which means they afterwards Printed many Books. Neverthelefs they being fcru-Moforn, and pulous and fuperfluinors like the Grecious whom they imitate, fome among them by crafty devices, when put and flickling perfors caused these Characters to be burned, fearing the Prefs might occasion some alteration or disputation in their Religion, and thus the matter was never further examined by Prince of People. But ought they (out of the great homour they had for their Religion) thus in a moment to lose this precious and excellent Jewell, onely for a vain and idle conception, that the brightness hereof, might in time discover something which might discolour and dim the luftre of this Monastisal Basilian Religion?

The four Mendicants allowed in the Latin Church, are not received among the Mofeovites, no The four Menmore then among the Greeks, Armenians, Neftorians, Aboffines, Georgians, Jacobins, Myngre- dicaus not relians, Syrians and other Easterly Christians. The covy.

The Lords Prayer in their Tongue differs not from the Latin, and therefore having got a copy thereof in the Moscovite Language, I thought it not amifs to insert it here, for their fake who delight in novelties, I had used their Characters also: but I thought that would have been unintelligible and uselefs to most Readers.

The Lords Prayer in the Moscovian Language.

Amin.

It is time now that we return to Bafil, to whom this present Discourse is addressed, relating the many mileries and misfortunes which attended his Reign. We find amongst Historians, he was so unfortunate in War, that he seldom quitted the Field without difgrace. Some attribute this to his Hotortunate in War, and why, roscope and to I know not what kind of benevolent or malevolent inclination of the Constellations, predominant in the hour of his Nativity, but when they have turmoil'd themselves about such sooleries a long time, they gain nothing thereby but the title of fools or mad men, for striving to foar higher then they are able, they fuddenly fall into many groß and ridiculous abfurdities.

As for my own part without entring into Gods Cabinet counfels, I think his wicked and abominable life made him so miserable. Paul Jovisu faith he was addicted to vices against Nature, which I think implety of Ba- better to conceal then mention, though fome maintain this implety to be as usual amongst the Moscovites, as it was ordinary amongst the inhabitants of Sodom and Gomorra. But how could they find in Bafil cruel and their hearts to hazard their lives for him, who was fo cruel and intolerable to them; Infomuch that he BARK CRUEI AND WOUld NOT Suffer his own Brethren, nor any Prince whatsoever to hold any Castles or Forts, nay they were forced at their own cost and charges to serve their Lord both in Court and Camp, as also in sending Embassies, and the greatest requital he made, was bestowing upon them some great Farms at a certain Rent, for the space or term of one year and half, which being expired, they were again compelled to ferve fix whole years on their own fcore, but if they refused to do it, the loss of goods and life immediately enfued; As it hapned to his great Favourite and Secretary, who, being delign'd Embalfador to the Emperor Maximilian, and aniwering he wanted accommodations for the Voyage, was flux up in Prison, where he died, and his goods were confiscated to the Prince, whereof his brethren could not get the value of a penny.

If at any time his Embaliadors returned home with prefents, this Bafil would feize upon them, alledging by the Law of Principality? that whattoever was given them, was his, feeing it was for his fake, that Princes formuch honour d them. This leffonhe taught the Embaffadors, fent by him to the Emperor Charles the Fifth, Who presented them with golden chains, and certain Spanish pieces of Gold, his brother Ferdinand also gave them Vessels of Silver, rich cloths, and many pieces of Gold coined in Germany. But affoon as they arrived home, this greedy glutton laid hands upon the belt and fairest presents, as though it had been a booty got from some enemy, whereof he would not onely have his share, but unjustly take that which a Captain would not resule to give his Souldier: I pass by the oppressions he used towards his subjects under pretence of an unlawfull and absolute power, seeing at this very day they who have the Soveraign Dominion over the rest, have liberty to exalt themfelves above and tyrannize over the poor Pelantry. Return we now to Bafil who was most commonly unfortunate in all his undertakings. In the Battle of Orfa under the conduct of Constantine Oftroges and John Suitzon, The Poloni-discomined by anis descated the Moscovian Army (being 80000 ftrong) slew betwirt 35 or 40000, took all the Policy in their Captains, and Lords of note, the whole Senate, and 4000 others prisoners. Bafil had much ado to fave himself in his Royal City of Mosco, although 60 leagues distant, so panted he for fear, left King Sigismond puff d up with victory, should attempt to purite him. Behold what coin Tyrants are paid in, who confider not the injuries, vexations, and indignities which they do their fubjects. You see this Duke (who was wont to tame his foes) by his too rudely handling his People, so weakned in his forces, that an handfull of Polonians routed his vaft Army, enough to swallow up Signimond and all his Souldiers.

In like manner the tharge which he received from the two Brothers Girees Mahomet, and Abfa, fo clipped his Wings, that he was forced to oblige himself by a promise under his hand, to be Mah mers perpetual Tributary, by this means he fent back the Tartars loaden with great spoils, having almost fired his whole Country, and triumphing over the great numbers of Molecoviet, which they had taken Prisoners, and fold in Taurica to the Tarks, and to divers others at Citraca dwelling upon the Caspian Sea. Now had Bast cherished, loved and honoured his People; he might have had enough valiant Captains who would have been able to have made work with these two Tartarian Kings ; but he fo trampled upon them, that they would not fir a foor for him, much lefs hazard their lives and fortunes, to fecure him, who fo cruelly tyrannized over them.

At last this Prince grew better, and took deliberation in high enterprizes, and being very subtil and and great fue- circumfpect obtained many fair Victories against the Tartars, took Smolenzko from the Polonians by the secret intelligence of Knez. Michil Liniki, and not onely kept what his brother John left him, but alfo added many more Provinces to his Empire; and befides Smolenzke he fubdued Plefcovy.

This man was the first who usurp'd the Name and title of King, for all his Predecessors were contented with the Name of Great Dukes, onely his Father would be called Great Lord of Russia, and The titles and this appellation Bafil also retained; and moreover caused himself to be stilled Emperor, a Title suitable appellations of the ambition and we remained to the King of Baland he does suitable himself King of Baland to his ambition, and yet writing to the King of Poland, he durft not fubfcribe himself King, but was contented with the name of Vuelichi Knezi, or Great Duke; and this he did because the neighbouring Princes would not receive letters from him with new Titles. But loe how he ftiles himself: The Great Lord Bafil, by the grace of God, King and Prince of Ruffia, Great Duke of Volodimeria, Moscovy, Novogard, Plescovy, Smolludby, Tuvery, Jugary, Permy, Viaky, Bulgary, &c. Great Lord and Duke of Low Nevogard, Exemisors, Rezaire, Volothia, Riferry, Bellyar, Roffony, Farsy, Bellyary, Condiny, Sec. But these of King and Emperor wherewith he adorned himself are comprized under the word Czar, which in the Ruffian tongue fignifies King, and by the Slavonians, Polonians, Hungarians and Bobemians is taken for Emperor or tation of the Cafar. And well may it be fo, for there is little difference betwirt Czar and Cafar. The reason word Caar. why he was called the white King is the same with the Persian King, who was termed Kisil passa, or Cafelhaz, because his Turbant was red, and so the Moschoute is called white from his labit, as you may see in this Dukes portraiture, which was copied out of an old book Printed in the Mescovian Bess's portrai-Language and Character, where he is just represented in the very fame drefs.

He first married Salomea a Subjects Daughter, with whom he lived above twenty years, but had His Wives, no issue, whereat being offended, he divorced her (say some) for her barrenness, but the effect declared he neigh'd after others, for either being over glutted or cloyed with her, or discovering a greater beauty, he pretended the was uncapable of child bearing, and therefore that her up in a Monastery, where the brought forth a Son, which not onely interrupted the defign of Marriage between Bafil and Helen, who died before the perfect confummation thereof, but also hindred him from another, whereat he was greatly vexed, because among the Russians many Wives are abominable. I find one diffi- Polygamy oculty moved concerning the infant of Salomea, for some seeing Demetrius Son to John deceased, and dious among Nephew to Basil, installed in the Dutchy, write that this poor Lady had this child by an unlawfull the Mosconier. conjunction; or elfe in all probability he had fucceeded Bafit as being his next heir. But then confider The Authors why he might not as well fucceed Bafit, as he did John; fome will alledge that Bafit to make himfelf thoughts of saabsolute Master, took Demetrius prisoner after his Fathers death, and therefore by his consent he was lomes's Son confecrated Duke of Moscovy, and so they are not to be compared together. Lastly Basil usurped the Dukedom, and Demetrins obtained it by his Uncles Election.

The end of Bafil's Life.

SEBASTIAN, I.

King of Portugall.

Sebastian King of Portugai.

Ever was there a braver Subject to Discourse upon, then this present, especially to fuch as are defirous to know the affairs and State of Portugall: now the Life of this King invites you to take a prospect of that fair and flourishing Kingdom. For my own part I should take great delight in expatiating upon this subject, for the honour I bear to the Portugall Commanders, did I not fear my tediousness would be distaftefull. Moreover I am perswaded a lover of curious Relations, will be much pleased to read the History of Hierom Oforium, Bishop of Algarva, and that excellent

Collection of Goulard in twenty Books; whose diligence I cannot sufficiently commend not only in this, but all his other Works which he hath treely communicated to the World. Wherefore I wholly address my self to Sebastian, who as he was indued with many rare qualities, so had he been very happy, had he not been over mastered by some bad passions, and had hearkned to fuch counfell, as might have prevented him from rash and indifferent actions, as it will evidently appear in this following Narrative. Sebastian then was Son to John Prince of Portugall, and Jane Daughter of the Emperor Charles the Fifth, who was delivered of him, Jan. 20. In the Year of our Lord, 1554. fitteen or eighteen days after her husbands death; fo that

Schassian being about four year old succeeded John the Third, his Grandsather, who died Jung Ar what age the eleventh, 1557, aged sity sive. Who though he held his Father Emanuel's place, yet did schassian benot imitate him in preserving and establishing his Throne; For he more minded the Spanish in-gan his Reign quistion and vain tales of others, then regarded the means of making his Kingdom shourish. If then this Realm began to be despicable in his time, it was much more so under the rigid Government of Sebastian, who all on a sudden surned what remained upside down. In brief after his defeat, it hailed so excessively, that there was not a whole tyle lest, everything became barren, and sell to their share, who at this day affirm the Portugall Crown also to belong unto them. But I will not concern my felf in these Quarrels, Return we therefore to Sebastian, whose corpulent body promised an Heroick and Martial disposition. Indeed he was a sebastian was comely Prince and of a brave Stature, as men report, I never faw him, though I faw his Grand- corpulent, father and Father, when I was at Lubon, returning back from my second Voyage into the Southern parts. At the first he was much loved and honoured amongst his Subjects, but afterwards fitting to make himself formidable, he loft his Peoples cordial affection, who seeing him sebastian by furnounded with a very strong Guard, and the number of his Courtiers augmented, presently augmenting entertain'd an ill opinion of him, and seared him with a servile and compulsive sear. But he got his Guards and nothing by it. Nevertheless Great Politicians set forth a Prince in the very colours of a Tyrant, Court, diminot suffering the common People to come near him, but these I remit to that great Justice nilhed his Sub-Robert Garnier Lieutenant criminall of Maine, who in his Tragedy of Mark Anthony jest love. brings in Cafar and Agrippa controverting this point, viz. Whether a Ruler ought to make himself formidable. The Words are to this effect.

Agr. What good reaps he, whom all the World does fear?
Cxl. This makes his Enemies to disappear.
Agr. But commonly such fear dosh batted gain,
Cxl. Hate without power is commonly but vain. Agr. Who fears his Prince, doth wish his Princes Death, Cal. Who fear; him not, will rob him of his Breath. Agr. There is no stronger Guard, safer defence, Then what doth from the Peoples love commence. Cal. Nothing is more uncertain, feeble, rude Then the favour of the fickle multitude.

If you believe Buffoons, Courtiers and Pick-thanks, you will then take Cafar's fide. But they who are right in their Wits, will incline to Agrippa. As for those who contradict his truth, the very confideration of King Sebaftian may make them bluth for shame. The simplicity of former Perungal Kings made their Soveraignty venerable and Reverend. But Sebaftian by in The decilining creating his Guards and Courtiers, decreased his State, and annihilated the ancient grandeur of the of the Perucreating his Guards and Courtiers, decreated his State, and annihilated the ancient grandeur of the of the PortuPortugalls. Yet to lay all the fisht on this young King, would be an injury to his generofity, gal Kingdom, who by inclining to bad counfell, cauted this lamentable decay, whereof at this day we behold too evident figns amongst the ruines of this ancient Kingdom of Portugall. Wherefore I will not altogether either justifie or condemn him, feeing his weakness and inhancy serves as a Shield against The good conthose dangerous blows which malled his Kingdom during his Minority. For it was after he began to be a Man, that he ingaged in those designs which totally ruined his Kingdom, the which in schifflin he found very rich, because of the Indian traffick, which many followed for the gain and advantage found his kingdom, which accrued to the Merchants thereby.

The City Likes increased to all mens thinking, being one of the most principal, not onely of Portugal, but of all Europe, and perhaps the fairest Sea-port Town upon the Ocean. From the Indiest his King received vast profit, where after the King of Cambaia's deseat, the Citadels were repaired, and all things peaceably smiled upon him. Finally the Kingdom of Portugal, had as it feems arrived to the Zenith of its happinels. But lo, all on a fudden it was overwhelmed, turned topfic turvy, and reduced to that extremity wherein we now behold it, by rea-fon of this young Prince, who was taken out of the World, in the flower of his age, as I elsewhere have declared. Nevertheless, it will not be amis to give a hint of this as we pass along.

Sebastian then being of a restless spirit, and addicted to Arms, having discovered the Wars in Barbary, be wint Auley Mahomet and Muley Abdalustich, for the Kingdoms of Fez. and Morocco, fent an Embaffador twice to Mahomet, offering what aid or affiftance he wanted to fubdue Abdalustich, but Mahomet flighted it, thinking he had forces enough to defroy his Uncle, but at laft, to his cost, being foundly beaten, he saw his errour in refulfing the Portugal The occasion excitairies. This induced him to feek Subalians friendship, and request his affiltance formerof schaffing the Abdalladors needed not many Arguments to incite him hereumo, who hugged woyage into his file the Social Subdement of the Abdalladors needed not many Arguments to incite him hereumo, who hugged woyage into his file the Social Subdement of the Abdalladors needed not many Arguments to incite him hereumo, who hugged woyage into his file the Social Subdement of the Abdalladors needed not many Arguments to incite him hereumo, who hugged woyage into himself for finding such an opportunity to fail into Africa. Whether he did well or ill to Barbary. intermeddle with these Princes quarrels, the judicious Reader may easily determine. They were both Barbarians who made mutual War; the Question then is, Whether Sibasian, who carning these continues the continues noth Europersons who made mutual War; the Querton then is, who were starting the went not to reconcile them; had not better have flaid at home, then have taken along with him gain 3000 Spearmen, 600 Italians, 2000 Spaniards, 600 Tingites, 2500 Volonteers, 600 Horfe stellitus exfrom Tingi, 1500 common Souldiers and Gentlemen of Portugali? Indeed that which most pedition.

rondemns Sebastian is, that he favoured an unjust cause. For when Mahomet had conquered his Uncle. Christianity was not advanced hereby, because still the power was in an Infidels hand. Again he fought to destroy Abdelmelech, who supported Christians, to extend Mahomets power : And yet he pretended this Voyage was undertaken for the rooting up of Maho-

To this end he took along with him the Popes Legate, who was impowered to grant thoufands of Pardons to those, who adhered to the King. But fecret Articles made between him and Muley Mahomet, canled him to fet forward his vast Fleet, presuming he might take two or three Sea-ports in Barbary, to maintain and secure it : Howbeit, Mulay Xeq Mahomets Son, and Sebastians Hostage, could not save him from Death; for through his own fault he rashly rushed into the unhappy Battle, sought between Abdelmelech and Mahomet , Aug. 4. 1378. At which time a Blazing Star appeared in Heaven, for the space of eighteen days, which the Aftrologers were pleased to interpret as a sad Omen and Presage of that worful calamity, that should befall the Portugall Kingdom. However, I will not trouble my self with these niceties and vain curiofity, but distinctly inform you, how this Valiant Prince came to his

When the two Armies drew nigh to one another, Abdelmelechs Troops made a stop to fix twist sebaftion their great Guns , expecting Sebaftian's approach ; immediately upon this they played their Canand Abdeline- nons; but before they had charged thrice, the Enemy re-faluted them, and then the two Vanguards desperately encountred each other with such an hail and tempest of Calivers and thundering Artillery, that all things feemed to be in a combustion. Forthwith the 500 Vanguard men, led by the Duke of Avero, routed Abdelmelech's left Wing, 10000 Alarbian Horse also fled 20 Leagues distant, and reported the news of the Christians Victory. Other Alarbs on the right Wing , began in like manner to give back , which so inraged Abdelmelech, that he went to rally his left Wing now almost quite defeated. But the Souldiers of his Guard feeing his weakness, detained him, and would not let him advance further, which so much grieved him and augmented his forrow, that he tumbled (like one in a fwoon) off his horse, faying nothing to them, but onely that he would have them advance more forward, this they did, The Death of putting him also into an Horse-litter, where he died about half an hour after. Nevertheless they concealed his Death, reporting he was onely taking his Reft: But certainly it was a profound fleep, out of which he never could awake again.

After this Rout of Abdelmelechs Vanguard, the Duke of Avero feeing himfelf not purfued, and fearing to ingage too far, was forced to retire with his Forces. The Moors perceiving that 500 Horse had shaken their whole Army, resumed courage, and sent a 1000 Harquebusiers to their Horle, and abundance of foot, to fall upon the Duke of Avero both before and behind, which they did with so much resolution, that the Duke and his Regiment were beaten and put to flight, and ran over their Infantry with great disorder and confusion; Sebastian seeing this, presently mounted his horse, being covered with green Armour, and attended by the Duke of Avero and a Squadron of Horse, gave an onset and repelled the Moors. But because he had not above 500 men, he was constrained to turn back, and so this second Retreat sped no better then the first. For then the whole body of Abdelmelechs Army, especially the Rereguard, fell fo furiously upon Sebastians Troops, that it is impossible to describe it. In this encounter were slain the Duke of Avero and many brave Gentlemen, the Artillery also was taken, to Sebastians great grief, who perceiving that the Rereguard wanted his recruits, being attended with 500 Horse, charged the Moors a third time in Muley Hameds Quarters, and so daunted them, that they fled above half a League from him. But unable to pursue them, he was forced to retreat to the reft of his Army, there to behold his approaching ruine: For the enemy having feifed his pieces of Ordinance, purfued the Victory, defeated the left Squadron on the River side, and broke into Muley Mahomets Troops (who marched betwirt the Rereguard and the River) and thus they made cruell havock of Mahomets men, wherefore Mahomet fled towards the River, thinking to ford it, but the water being muddy, his Horse fluck fast in the mire, and gave such a violent yerk, that Mahomes lost his Stirrops, and being not able to swim, The Death of was drowned and choaked in the mud. On the other hand, the Moors were so numerous, that they encompassed Sebastian and his men on every side, discomsted the greatest part of them, for they were left defenceles, by reason that most of their Ammunition was that very day lavishly and indiscreetly spent. And though some discharged, it was onely to get to their Chariots, for the number of run-aways increated their misfortune, so that they ran one over another, and the Horsemen trampled upon them. The 8600 Pikemen left their Pikes to the enemy, which caused Sebastians deseat, having not Harquebusiers enough to supply their room. Nevertheless Sebastian laid about him on all sides, though commonly attended but with seven or eight Tingises which never forfook him. The Portugall Horse being tired and out of heart, quitted their saddles, and hid themselves under their Chariots; and seeing all lost, lest the King in the conslict, and fled some on soot, some on horseback towards Arzilla, but they were hostly pursued, and most of them cut in pieces. Sebastian at length sought with some Horseand beat down so many men, that his enemies durft not come nigh him. Yet at laft fixty of the most valiant Souldiers inclosed him . fo that seeing himself no longer in a condition to fight, or escape with life, he commanded one of his Souldiers to hold up the white colours at his Spears-end, in token of his furrendring. But such was his hard fate, that they being Alarbes who incompassed him, underflood not the fignal, but thought on the contrary he called his men to help him, wherefore affailing flood not the ugnat, our through on the contact. The Victors purfued the chale untill midnight, him furiously on all hands, they slew him in the place. The Victors purfued the chale untill midnight of the Contact of all being dispersed or taken, and thus nothing remained of the Portugall Army but dead bodies. The prisoners then taken were above 14000 which afterwards were sent to several places, where they King sebistian were made Slaves: Those who escaped were about 200, the number of the slain above 12000, Among which the principal were King Sebafiian, the Duke of Avere, the Marquels of Ireland, the Bishops of Conimbria and Port, Christopher Tavora the Popes Legatt, Alvaro Perez his Brother, and many others; besides a great number of Captains, Knights and Gentlemen. Who had they survived, had recovered the glory of the Portugall State. But behold so it is, He that begins a thing untowardly, ends it ill-favouredly.

Sebastian hazarded his Life, Forces and Estate, to espouse the Quarrell of an Enemy to Christi- It is very danans, but at last was dismounted and slain. And indeed it could not otherwise be, but he should light geron some on some missortune, seeing Necessity is an invincible Enemy, and he also had ingaged against a defeating a despe-

took their King Prisoner.

We cannot produce a better example to confirm this, then that of King John, who chose rather to hazard his own Person, State and Nobility in the midst of his Kingdom, then make Peace with the English Army, who onely desired to escape with their Lives utterly despairing of Victory. Yet it so hapned, that 10000 of them, deseated the French Army confisting of 40 or 50000 and

Gaßon de Foix committed the fame fault, who having got the day in the Battle of Ravenna, would needs pursue a Squadron of Spaniards, and so loss his life, and less all that he had conquered in Italy as a prey to his Enemies.

More wifely acted Fabins the Great, who rather endured to becalled coward, then incounter the Foe after the rate of other Captains, who were foundly beaten for their too forward boldness. Thus he had the honour of faving his Countrey by paufing.

But our Sebastian was so busie, that as his fingers itched, so he took delight to meddle with o ther mens quarrels fo far, that in deciding them, he loft the fair and precious Jewel of his Life, to the great grief of many Christian Princes.

The end of the Life of Sebastian

Quoniambec AGiantlike man

Any persons intending to speak of those wonderfull rarities which God has dispersed in these Countries not long since discovered unto us, are as a stand, whether they ought to believe those, who have travelled through these Regions and unknown Lands. That they have reason to be aftonished, it cannot be denied, if we restect upon what they have common with us, which though not so curiously dressed, as the European skill can refine it, yet may if throughly considered ravish those with admiration, who carry themselves highest. For they will find themselves much mistaken, when they understand how the Americans excell us in many things.

Not to mention the pleafantnefs and fertility of the Countrey, though this would afford matter enough to amaze us, God having given them such mighty plenty, and endued them with such excellencies, that some ignorant fools not understanding how the Almighty causes his Sun to shine upon the first and unjust, have attempted to consirely his liberality, who hath watered this fourth part of the World with such infinite blessings. But this is (as one may say) little in respect of those graces, wherewith the Instabitants of this new World are adorned, who though far remote from the true Son of righteousness, whose light they perceive very dimly, are nevertheless decked with many exquisite perfections both of body and soul. For a Demonstration hereof I will onely produce this dreadfull Quaniambee, of whom I may well discourse, for I have seen him, and sufficiently observed him upon the River of Januara, where the Lord of Visla-gaignon caused us to stay. This place is situated under the Tropick of Capricorn 23; degrees distance from the Equator and 66; degrees from the Anarcick Pole. Wherefore they are mithate, who relying upon Lary's calculation, place it 23 degrees from the Anarcick Pole. Quaniambee was remarkable above all other persons in that Countrey, both for his Gigantine Stature, and eminent degree, which made him appear higher then others. Ever and anon our Captain difcourfed with him concerning things worthy to be fought and prized.

This Demy-Gyant had a great body proportionably gross, exceeding strong, and he knew well how to use his bodily strength, which he chiefly imployed in overcoming his enemies, and making them vield to his power. I remember I have elsewhere written something touching this person, whose pouryield to his power. I truitement Hard through from that Countrey) with two green Rones in his cheeks traiture I here represent which I brought from that Countrey) with two green Rones in his cheeks and one on his chin. He was so strong, that without burning himself, he could carry a great Vessel The wonderful of wine in his Arms, and to attonish his enemies, he lifted up two pieces of Ordinance, (which by force The wonders of which is the had taken from a Portugall ship) and laid them on his shoulders, rurning the mouth of these Cannons towards his approaching see, he commanded one of his men to fire them, and when they were discharged, he took more, untill he had scattered his gnemies, and then God knows how much he did deride them. This is a story not common, nor indeed credible to every one, but to men of profound urrue mem. 111115 a toty in the matter to believe it politible, confidering his valt bulk and lyrength. And underflanding it is no hard matter to believe it politible, confidering his valt bulk and lyrength. And yet John de Lery who would perfuvab himself, that he has incloided the fiercets of the new World in John Lery team Oyfter-shell, will not vouchfafe to believe, that this Savage could in this manner differarge thele two proved. pieces, without burning himfelf, or hurting his shoulders by their recoyling. I will not produce experience against him, because I know he never saw the man of whom I speak, and therefore will not condescend to reason without experience, which along makes wife men fools. Yet nevertheless he has not gained his cause, though he and others cannot represent this as a truth. For I may lawfully affirm, that this great Prince could do, what I have related concerning him. But because I will not be so critical as to produce Philosophical reasons, I will bring Lery himself to prove my affertion. First I will suppose that he composed those books, which are entitled his, concerning the siege of Sancerre, and his Voyage into America, though none that know him, will believe he was the Author of them ; nis voyage nio America, incogning at l'Epine who dwelt twelve years in that Count ey at the amongst whom we may reckon Monsteur at l'Epine who dwelt twelve years in that Count ey at the fame time as Lety did. Moreover 1 might challenge him for stealing a great deal out of other mens Works, but not to draw up a new inditement against him, I am content to stand to my former charge, and allow him to be the Author, fo, fo. And yet it will hardly be granted, that he being a Mechanick could write fo well. However I will not upbraid him onely with his profession, let us see whether he has not written something in his Books far more incredible then the History of Quoniambec.

I am affamed thus to employ my pen in correcting this Embroiderer, who has ftuffed his writings with fo many lies, that those who bear him the leaft ill-will, are forced to blush at his fopperies and Lery's Lies, toyes, wherewith he endeavours to feed the eyes of his Readers.

He is 6 impudent, as to affirm that his name in the Savage Language, fignifies an Oyster, which is Lety an Oyster a manifest untruth. But admit it were so, it is not fo great a matter as he makes it, because he was not an Oyster inclosed in his two natural shells, but in the Castle of Coligny, where the Sieur of File-aignon shut him up. What think you of those productions Tortoites (which he says are under the gaignon shut him up. What think you can to those productions of the says are under the Tortid Zone) so exceeding big, that one alone will dine so men (perhaps such who have no stomachs) Lety's product and the shell thereof cover a dwelling house. I cannot think he defigned these formans use, but rather our Tortoises' for Flies and such other forts of Insects. But omitting his great Whales, Crocodites of an hundred foot long, and the rest of his fabulous Fibs, I will now return to Quoniambee.

This Quantumbee was greatly feared by the Margageans, Partuguifes and others, for the mighty Quantumbee's frength of his great and ponderous Body: But more for his prudence, which fo gracefully he used, commendable that at the same time he involved his foes in the skins of the Lyon and Fox.

In my Cosmography I observed how he was bespangled withmany Virtues, no great enemy to piety, for he believed the immortality of the foul, and took great delight to see us exercise our Religion; yea, and would kneel down with us, when we made our grayers.

yea, and wome since a own wine and the second of the second of the second of the was the greateft Boaster, that ever I heard speak, for he told us he had overcome many thousands. Indeed his Pallace was hung round with his enemies heads. His Territories in my time were well peopled, and bounded with Mountains and Rivers, from whence also the River Veses had its name, the River of because they who fail therein behold the tops of hills and Rocks, naturally representing the shape of v.siels, Vesses both ancient and modern. Insomuch that at Revermont, betwitt Chastillon and Colonges, they call it the Bridge of Pots, because the Rocksare cut and fashioned like the Vessels which are called in The Bridge of France Onles from the Latin word Olas. Some say the Rhone resounding at the foot of Mount Pots.

CHRISTOPHER COLUMBUS A Genoese.

Christopher Columbus Genevois Dixit, 1493

le common Proverb, They who promife Mountains of Gold, propose what cannot be accomplished, will be contradicted by the diligent fearch of this excellent Pilot, who having promised the Kings of England, Porengall and Spain fuch Mountains, did indeed make it good to those who followed his wife Counfell. Upon his name some have more pleasantly then prudently defeanted, comparing him to the Pigeon in Noah's Ark, which after the flood brought tidings of the Earth. Because Columbus failed so far, that he discovered unknown Lands. But omitting these subtilities, I will briefly relate his life, whose pourtraiture with many others I got at Lisbon in Portugall. He was born at Cugnero or (as some say) at Albizolo, a poor small Village on the River Gennes

He traffiqued into Portugall, and passing by the Streights of Gibraltar, observed by long experience, that at a certain feafon of the Year, there were fome Sea-winds came from the West, which blew equally one way, many days together without any variation. And confidering they could not proceed but from the Earth beyond the Sea; he so deeply fixed the Idea hereof in his Head; that at the new World laft he resolved to find it out.

Hereupon being aged about fourty Years (as M. Urban Chauveton relates in his History of the new World after Don Peter Martyr of Millain) he goes to the State of Gennes or Genoa, and propofes to them his Defign of paffing beyond the Streights of Gibratia, and failing so far westward, that he would encompals the World, and finally arrive to those Lands which brought forth Spices.

He promised to enter into Bond to go through with this defign, if they would but supply him with Columbus defome thips well armed, and furnished with provisions and men. The attempt feemed to them too bold fires the Geand too wonderfull. On that they would not advantage to simplify the state of the state and too wonderfull, fo that they would not adventure to give him any encouragement. Therefore him in the diffrom thence he failed into Portugall, where he found King Alfonfus the Fifth employed in his Ex- covery of a peditions into Africk and fending his ships to the East-Indies, and the King of Castille had then his new World. hands full of the War against the Moors of Granada. He had fent his Brother Bartholomew into England, to propose the business to Henry the seventh, a rich and powerfull Prince, but he found His brother him unwilling to entertain any fuch motion. At his brothers return from England, he made known Bartholomewin his define to the King of Particular who cave him as little and the Control of England for this design to the King of Portugall, who gave him as little encouragement as the English and Genoofe that purpose, had before. For at his Court they had the misfortune to meet with the Bishop of Viso, with Don Rodrigo, and other pragmatical fellows who fancied themselves very well skilled in all the mysteries of Cosmography. When therefore Columbus discoursed to them of another world full of Gold and riches, they treated him in a proud manner as an extravagant, affirming that there could be no fuch Columbias refuthing. So that he got nothing from the Genoefee for his labour but the efteem of a Lunatick, from fed by the K. the English, but of a Fool fit to make sport, and from the Portuguises, the reputation of a Dreamer of Portuguis. whose brains were cracked. Notwithstanding all these discouragements he for sook not his design, but sailed to Paby de Moguer, where he acquainted himself with John Perez, a Franciscan of Rubida a famous Cosmographer, he advised him to open his defign to Henry Duke of Medina Sidonia, and afterwards to Louys Duke of Medina Celi; but they gave him no other encouragement than the Kings of England and Portugall had done before. This caused him to travel to the Court of Castille to King Ferdinand and Queen Isabelle, unto whom he declared his business and what likelihood there Columbus in was of fuccefs, affuring them that he wanted only means to put it in execution. At his first arrival he the Court of met with many repulles, but in time he found a favourable reception, for the Queen spoke in his behalf, and Don Alfonfus Quinte ville high Treasurer of the Kingdom, introduced him to Don Peter Gonsales de Mendozza Archbishop of Toledo. Assoon as Ferdinand had put an end to the wars of Granada, he granted him his request and liberty to fearch out another World, giving him by Letof Grandal, the granted him his requert and incerty to learen our another worth, giving him by Letters Patents the Tenth part of all the Kings Rems and Cultions, in all the Lands that he thould difcover. And because the King had no Money ready for this Expedition, Don Lowy, his Secretary of conditions the State, lent him seventeen thousand Ducats. With this Money Columbus prepared a great Ship and King of Ciffille two Barques, hiring fax(core Mariners and Souldiers for his purpose.

Martin Alfonson Prinzen grants Columnanded in one, in the other, Francis Vinner and Eneas, Martin's brother were Captain and bus his request. Master. In the great Ship he commanded in chief with his brother Bartholomew. He set fail from Paby upon a Friday the third day of August, 1492. In his Voyage hemet with as many difficul-Columbus fails ties as he had done to perswade the enterprize, for he was mightily troubled by such as did accompany him ; when they wanted victuals they were ready to kill him, and when they were fale arrived to Land, they could not abide him, because of the punishment of such as did behave themselves ill in their places, as we shall see in the sequel of this History. He failed many days without discovering any Land, which made the Souldiers mutiny, afterwards in good earnest they rose up and threatned him The Souldiers more grievously, when they had failed about 35 days further without discovering any Land. This of Columbus in a Mutiny, aftonished the poor Genoese, who had no other means to satisfie them, but by his entreaties and Prayers he defired them to have a little more patience. At last their Voyage had been so long that their fresh water was almost all spent, therefore they threatned again to cast him over-board, if he did not fail back again: So that to fatisfie them, he was forced to promife to obey their defires, in case they did not find Land within three days. The next day Columbia commanded the fails to be lower'd, because he faw a far off at Sun rifing fome black Clouds very low in the Sky, and fmelt the fresh air, which caused him to judge the Land to be very near. The next night, which was that of the 11th of November, 1492. Roderick, a skilfull Marriner of Leppa, looking out from the top of the Main-mast, he cryed 1492. Roderick, a skilled marring of Leppin, rooming our tome fire at a diffrance, and to the Ships company to take good courage, for that he did fpy out fome fire at a diffrance, and The first Dif-Salfeda, a fervant of Columbus affored them, that the Admiral his Mafter had feen the fame. A covery of debout two hours after midnight, Columbus called to a Gentleman of Spain, named Escobedo, who nerica waited upon the King in his Chamber, and told him that he did fee fire very near them, and that they could not be far from Land. The first Land that they espied was Guana Bay, one of the American Islands, situated between Florida and Cuba, where they landed and took possession of the New World. From thence they failed to Barucon, a Sea-port of Cubs, where they took aboard some few Indians; with them they returned back to the Isle of Hayes, where in the Haven they dropt their Anchor, in the place which Columbus named the Royal Haven. But they were forced all to land on a sudden, because their great Ship had struck against a Rock, and was by that missortune split. When the Indians perceived these strangers provided with short iron staves that made so loud a report, they ing were frighted from the Sea-coast into the Mountains. By chance the Spaniards caught a Woman, whom they treated very kindly, giving unto her Bread, Wine, Sweetmeats, Linen and other cloath-ing. When the reft of the Inhabitants faw how kindly this Woman had been treated by them, they came to their Ships in Multitudes, to exchange their Gold, their Bread, and other commodities for the Bracelets, Beads, Bells, Glasses, and other Babbes of the Spaniards. Christopher Columbius and

Goacanagars or Guacanari, a Prince of this Island, entertained one another very nobly with mutual gifts and many expressions of kindnels. After this our Genoefe longed to return and carry news of his fuccessfull Voyage to the King of Spain. To secure the Spanish interest the better in this new found Land, with the confent of the Indian King, he built a hafty Fort with wood and earth, where he left 38 Spaniards, under the Command of a Captain named Rodericus d' Arma of Cordona. When the Castle was finished, he took a Ship-board ten Indiane, fourty Parrots, many Tortels, and many other Animals ftrange to our World, with all the Gold that he had got for his Trifles; fo in so days he arrived fafe with a prosperous gale to the Haven of Paby. When the King and Queen had understood that this Countrey was easie to be conquered, and that it was full of inestimable riches because of the Mountains sull of Gold there, they hastned thither a stronger Fleet than before, under the command of this Columbus, unto whom they confirmed all his priviledges in the City of Barcelona the 28th day of May, 1493. They gave him many Religious men, Mechanicks, to go along with him, and Horles, Cows, Sheep, Goats, Sows, Affes, to fill and flock the Countrey. With all this Equipage he took his leave of the Bay of Cadiz the 23 day of September, 1493. with much more courage than in his first Voyage. He was much troubled when he heard at the Isle of Hayri, called Hispaniola, that the 38 men left with their Captain Roderigo had been killed by the Inhabitants, becaule of the vexations and violences which they did offer to their gods, and to the honour of their women. At this time he did not dare to punish the Indians, but lest it till another opportunity. There he landed and built a Town which he named Ifabilla, and a Fort near the Mines of Gibao, to protect the Spaniards employed in the preparing of the Gold, from the affaults of the Natives: His Brother he made Governour of the Island. From hence he failed with three Ships to discover the Land towards the South of Cuba, the Island of Jamaica, and several other places, and then returned again to Hifpaniela, where he found a very commodious Haven, which he named Port St. Nicholas. He had a delign to destroy all the Natives, named the Caribies, but his fickness hindered him, and the difturbance that happened at I fabella by the baseness and cruelty of the Spaniards, who had by their filthy behaviour scandal zed all the chief inhabitants of the Island. He endeavoured to gain their efteem and affection, by putting to death all the Spaniards that had been guilty of any unworthy action. This execution of the Spaniards, and especially of Gaspar Freiz of Arragon, whom he caused to be hanged, did offend all his Company fo much, that as foon as he was recovered of his diftemper, he failed in all haste towards Spain, to justifie himself from the crimes of which he had been accused by some that did countenance the offenders. The King had dispatched his Chamberlain John Aguado, to send home Columbus as a Prisoner into Spain. When he came to Medina del Campo where the Court was then kept, he presented the King and Queen with many gifts, and then shewed the processes of all the Spaniards that had been executed by him. Which gave such satisfaction to the King and the Court, that they declared him to be innocent, and free from the crimes that had been imputed to him. His third Voy- Therefore the King equipped another Fleet of eight Ships, for to feek for and discover more Land. Columbus fent two of them before with Provision and Ammunition, and with the fix others he fet fail from St. Lucars of Barrameda the 28th day of May, 1497. and directed his course straight to the Madera, one of the Illands of the Portuguefes, named Affores; from whence he fent three Ships to Hispaniola with three hundred banished men, and with the three other Ships he failed to the Islands of Cape Verd, from whence he went under the Equinoctial Line into the West-Indies. He arrived at the Gulf of Paria, and cast Anchornear the Isle of Cubaqua, which he named the Isle of Perles. Celumbus made several expeditions against the Islanders, and found out many other Islands. At last Roldan Xime- lie was hated by the Spaniards, fo that Roldan Ximenes the Judge would not obey his Orders, he with 70 more mutinied against him and departed from him to Siragua, from whence they fent grievous complaints against him and his brothers to the King, who was mightily displeased to see the affairs of the Indies managed fo ill. Therefore he fent thither Francis Bonaldello a Knight to be Governour. He arrived fale in Hispaniola with his Fleet of four Ships, in the year 1499. When he had well inquired into the behaviour of Columbus and of his Brethren Bartholomew and James, he sent them in chains into Spain. Where when their causes had been heard before the King, he found no reason to give credit to the acculations and calumnies fent against them. Therefore to honour Columbia's fidelity and innocency, he fent him about three years after with three Ships the 9th of May, 1502. to feek for more land. When he was come to the Island of Hispaniola near the River Ocana, Nicholas d' Quanda, the Governour of the Illand, would not suffer him to fet foot in the Town of St. Domingo. This refulal grieved him to the heart, because he had been the first Founder of it. Therefore he sailed from thence towards the West, and discovered the Island of Guanaxo, which is not far from a large Province of the Main Land, called by the Natives Higuera, and by the Spaniards el Capo de Honduras. Afterwards he parted from thence and directed his course Eastward, where he found out the Countrey named Veragua. He landed upon the Islands of Zorobaro near the Continent, where the Inhabitants told him, how that all the Province of Veragna did abound in Gold. This report made him fail all along the coast, to the Gulf of Uraba, where he fet foot ashore and heard of the South-Sea. From thence he returned back to Cuba, and then to Jamaica, where he lost two Galleys; with the other two he went further to find out new Countries, but he endured many troubles and dangers, for many of his company fell fick, and the Spaniards themselves could not suffer him. The Indians knew well enough how to make advantage of it, when they faw that Francis de Porras, and James, Columbus's brother were gone with their Barks to the Island of Hispaniola. Columbus was then in diftress for want of Victuals, neither could be obtain any by Love, Prayers or force of Arms. Meer necessity forced him to this Invention. He sent for some of a neighbouring Village, whom he afford, that if they did not furnish him in his need, that God would fend them such Plagues that they should all die most miserably. And for affurance of the truth of what he faid, he told them that they should Hienorables fee the Moon in Eclipse of a bloody colour, if they would take notice of it. When according to his fubriley. prediction they faw the Moon of such a red colour, they brought to him plenty of Victuals all the time that he ftaid amongst them in that Island, intreating him to pardon them, and not to be offended any more with them. After all his Voyages and labours, this skillfull Sea-man fickned and died at Valadolid the 8th of May, 1506. He commanded in his Will that his body should be transported to Sivil, to the Convent of the Monks of Gerrofa. Thele Verles have been written in his praife in Ita-

He left behind him two Sons: Don Diego was married to Mary of Toledo the Daughter of Don Hischildren Ferdinando, the great Commendator of Leon: the other was Don Ferdinando, who never was married, and who had a stately Library of above twelve thousand Volumns, at present in the Convent of The rich librathe Dominicans of Sivil, the was a worth gift of for excellent a Pather. He of the honor of underflood well the Lais tongue, and was well skilled in Cosmography; this enabled him to find by having first distance the Amipodes, and the rich Countrey of Cipango, mentioned by Mark Paul a Venetian. He had covered the read also the Times, and the Critics of Plato, where he makes mention of a great Island named At-Tantea, and of a Countrey under water greater then all Asia and Africk together. He had read also what Arishule saith to Theophrassus in his book of the Worlds Wonders, that some Merchants of Carthage had been carried beyond the straits of Gibraltar towards the South and the West, where they had discovered a great Island, when they had failed a long time upon the Sea, which was without inhabitants, but was well furnished with all things needfull to the life of man, and watered with great Navigable Rivers. To stop the mouth of these persons envious of the honour of Columbus, I will mention nothing but what he himself said to some Spanish Gentlemen at a feast unto which he had been invited; when they were discoursing of the discovery of the Indies, he called for an Egg, then he defired them one after another to make the Egg stand upright without leaning in the middle of a Table. A very good when every one had tried what he could do, he took the Egg and knockt the end of it against the first the first the could be a support to the tried what he could do, he took the Egg and knockt the end of it against the first them.
